We have been discussing what is a job creation programme. On many occasions in the House we discuss job creation. But the job creation programme that could have the most dramatic impact on our economy and on the unemployment queues is that programme which results in an increase in Britain's share of world trade in manufactures. Hon. Members may be familiar with the figures. In 1964, the United Kingdom had about 14 per cent. of the world's share of trade. By 1979 it had gone down to 8 per cent. The CBI tells us that each 1 per cent. represents 250,000 jobs. Thus, in one way or another, our economy was so weakened during that period that, in effect, we exported 1·5 million British jobs. To get back a significant proportion of those exported jobs would indeed make major inroads into the numbers unemployed.

In the British motor industry we have BL employing 81,000 people; Ford, 57,300; Vauxhall, 20,053; and Talbot, 7,109. They together account for over 90 per cent. of car and commercial vehicle manufacture in the UK. We have a number of independent and specialist manufacturers in both sectors, including Jaguar, Rolls-Royce, Lotus, TVR, and Reliant. The components industry, to which hon. Members have referred, includes large multinational companies such as Lucas and GKN and numerous small specialist companies, in all employing about 200,000 people. In the main, the motor industry provides the bulk of its employment in the west midlands and south-east regions.

The good health of the industry, with an increase in its share of the domestic market and an improvement in exports, could bring about a healthy increase in the number of jobs available in manufacturing industry generally. When we discuss job creation, we should ask ourselves what a certain Government measure or request to the Government would do for our competitiveness in our endevour to increase our share of world trade and, therefore, increase the number of jobs in the economy.

We are coming up to the peak buying period for cars. At this time somebody in the House usually appeals to the nation's consumers to buy British. This time there is more reason than ever for British consumers to note the rapid improvement in the quality of British cars and in the level of productivity of our car plants—there has been a truly dramatic increase, particularly at Longbridge — to examine the changes that have taken place on the shop floor and in the style and professionalism of management. It is surely correct for us to say that those who are really concerned about job creation, which includes the vast majority of the public, should think hard, if they are exercising a buying decision, about which car to buy with a new registration plate attached to it. I know that by saying that there will be a few people who will put pen to paper immediately to tell me, "I bought British, but the car that I bought was of poor quality, it did not perform and it was a rogue. I shall never buy British again." I know the contents of such letters almost by heart. I shall not report the name of my most fanfous correspondent, but there is a solicitor in Bristol who seems to enjoy responding to any exhortation to buy British. I take the opportunity of advising him that I have noted his past letters. I hope that he no longer has reason to complain about the quality of his car.

There has been a dramatic improvement in the quality of British produced cars. It is time for consumers to look again at British products in the interests of consumer satisfaction and in the broader issues of the British economy. In so many respects, we have a good story to tell.

The level of import penetration in our markets is uncomfortably high. That is in part a consequence of our recent industrial history. For a number of reasons, the industry failed to meet the needs of the consumer. This has been the not unexpected consequence of a more general industrial malaise. There has been too much capacity across Europe and the industry has been chasing too few customers, which has resulted in disorderly and unprofitable levels of pricing. Our component suppliers and assemblers are starting to perform again. They have re-entered the competitive race and they are matching our competitors on quality and price.

I know that the House will not wish me to delay it for too long. However, I shall respond to the comments made about multinationals. It is common ground between the Government and the multinational vehicle producers that it is necessary for a better balance to be struck between what these companies sell in the United Kingdom and what they manufacture or source here. This applies as much to components and materials as to complete vehicles. In order to encourage an improved balance, we have had and are continuing to have meetings with senior management at Ford, Vauxhall and Talbot to get across our message of concern and I hope that the companies are now aware of the seriousness of our intent.

I shall take the three companies in turn. A quiet revolution has taken place at Talbot. It has declared its intention to manufacture a significant proportion of its new mid-range model, the C28, at its Ryton plant, commencing at the end of the year. I welcome that. We welcome the continuation of the contract with Iran, which is still extremely significant.

Ford is committed to raising the British-built share of its car sales in the United Kingdom although much depends on how successful it is in improving the performance of its car plants in Britain. In the past three years, the contribution from Ford's British assembly plants has increased from 51·6 per cent. to 57·3 per cent., but if Ford could achieve full utilisation of its installed capacity in Britain, the percentage would rise significantly. At present, the United Kingdom content of Ford cars built in Britain averages 80 per cent. and the overall EEC content of its cars averages 92 per cent. Ford also makes in Britain all its trucks, tractors and Escort vans for the whole of Europe and exports large volumes of engines and other major components to Continental plants. Recently announced plans for the manufacture of new engines at Dagenham and transmissions at Halewood are important in this context and I applaud them.

I am encouraged by Vauxhall's recent concern with respect to broad balance and in particular by the fact that it has set up a high level task force covering General Motors' operations in Europe as well as in the United Kingdom. The function of this task force is to investigate ways of improving GM's performance with regard to United Kingdom sourcing. The Government expect that the task force will arrive at positive recommendations for improving the current state of affairs by which Vauxhall produces here less than half the cars that it sells in the United Kingdom. Even in those cars, the average United Kingdom content does no more than hover around 50 per cent. The Government look to Vauxhall to support its declarations of intent with positive demonstrations of its determination to move in the right direction. I hope very much that these demonstrations will be forthcoming. I know that the fleet buyers in particular will follow these developments with great interest.

The message is clear. The companies, wherever they have not done so, need to attain international levels of competitiveness. Once that is achieved, the United Kingdom will look for the same contribution in terms of investment and jobs as has been diverted in the past, to locations abroad. The contribution of the multinationals must be commensurate with the gains that they derive from our markets.

Of course, the Government seek to take a lead in our public purchasing policies by encouraging all major public purchasers to think carefully about the local content of vehicles before buying them. Individual consumers can also contribute to the future of the vehicle industry.

Within Europe, I know that our trading terms with Spain, especially the imbalance in the vehicle sector, has been a deep grievance throughout the industry. As hon. Members are aware, this problem originated in the agreement between Spain and the Community which was signed in 1970, before we were even Community members. We have now addressed this problem under the terms of accession of Spain to the Community.

There are three principal measures that should be helpful. First, all the Spanish import duties against our cars will be phased out over seven years, and one half of that cut will be in the first three years. Secondly, Spain will be required to impose VAT, rather than her present tax regime for imported cars, from 1 January 1986. This will lessen discrimination against imports——

In accordance with Mr. Speaker's Ruling—(Official Report, 31 January 1983; Vol. 36, c. 19)—the debate was concluded.

Agriculture (Scotland)

8.12 am

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am sure that hon. Members welcome the opportunity to debate this important topic, albeit at this early hour. People realise that this is a critical time for Scottish agriculture. Agriculture in Scotland and throughout the Community can be said to be at a crossroads. Those of us who have regular contact with the industry are well aware of people's concern.

For most of the past 40 years, the industry has been urged on by Governments, whatever their political hue, to increase home food production. The industry has responded, in terms of efficiency and productivity, when contributing to domestic food production. Such production made an important contribution during those years when we did not have the benefit of North sea oil to prop up our balance of payments.

The message to the industry is now different. Agriculture is clearly in transition. Governments and the public recognise the need to contain expenditure on the common agricultural policy. There has been control of production in commodities in the case of structural surpluses. Last year, the dairy industry had to go through a traumatic period of transition to accommodate the new quota system. Now cereal growers are uncertain about future moves to cut cereal production.

There are ever-increasing pressures on modern agriculture to take account of modern environmental interests. Those interests are quite proper, provided that those who push them remember that our rural areas are living regions. They are places in which people have been brought up and work and are not simply those parts of the countryside to which the urban dwellers retreat at weekends.

Generally, the National Farmers Union of Scotland has been responsive to these changes. It is clear from regular reading of press releases and the proceedings of the meetings of Scottish members with their officers that these new factors are in people's minds. If the industry is in a state of transition, we hope that the Government will be more responsive to its problems and more supportive of it. Last month when the Secretary of State attended the Royal Highland Show at Ingliston he said that the Government were the friend of the farmer, but many farmers to whom I have spoken say, "With friends like that, who needs enemies?"

All hon. Members will have received representations from the National Farmers Union nationally and locally about the anxiety of the dairy industry at the rumours that quotas may be transferred from Scotland to Northern Ireland. Scotland's full allocation of almost 30 million litres under the outgoers scheme has been taken up. There is considerable anxiety that a further sum will be made available to fund outgoers, but that the quotas so released will not be retained in Scotland, but transferred to Ulster.

The Minister will be well aware of the opposition that that has generated. It is feared that such a scheme will represent the loss of what may rightly be described as a Scottish asset, and will generally undermine those still engaged in dairying in Scotland. Above all, it is feared that if we lose any more milk production, the viability of many local creameries will be threatened. While that is the general case for Scotland, I am not ashamed to say that it is particularly true for the islands. Given the Under-Secretary's constituency, knowledge and background, he must share similar anxieties.

One must pay tribute where tribute is due, and the Government have acknowledged the particular problems faced by the islands. There was a lower percentage cut when the quota regime was introduced, and in the regulations laid before the House in March a specific provision was made for the allocation of outgoers quota in remote and island areas.

In some parts, such as Orkney where the creamery is highly dependent on sustaining a particular level of throughput, there is anxiety that, if there is further loss of production by individuals, that quota should remain within the islands. Certainly, if the Government are considering transferring quota to Northern Ireland, the entire Scottish industry will find it a bitter disappointment and will oppose it. Indeed, it has already voiced its opposition. It would be particularly grievous to the island economies if they lost any quota.

There has also been considerable consternation throughout the industry about the cut in capital grants. Initially a £5 million cut was announced last December, which was compounded by the announcement earlier this month of the new capital grant regulations. I am sure that the House does not need to be reminded that 87 per cent. of Scottish farms lie within less favoured areas. We use the term "less favoured areas" so often that we may forget what it means. They are less favoured because of the land, and for geographical and climatic reasons. The point of designating those areas as naturally less favoured is that they need more favour from Community and national agricultural support. Despite the high percentage of Scottish farms in less favoured areas, they have had to bear an equal, and some may argue a disproportionate, proportion of the cuts in agricultural spending. Field drainage grant support has been reduced within 12 months from 70 to 30 per cent. Farmers in those areas, especially hill farmers and livestock producers, are not contributing to structural surpluses and over-production. The grants which they seek were previously available at higher rates, for example for reseeding, field drainage and fencing, and are for works of necessary and routine maintenance. There is a great fear that, because of the cut in grant support, these very necessary investments will also be cut. That in the long term must spell danger, and it will be unsatisfactory in the context of future long-term prospects for agriculture.

These cuts come at a time when there is little buoyancy among the livestock producers in the less favoured areas. The annual review of agriculture published earlier this year examined income developments by farm type, and concluded that on hill and upland less-favoured area farms, there was a general fall in income in 1983-84 following a more pronounced drop in the previous year. That report added:

"In 1984-85 incomes in these farms are expected to show some recovery, except in Scotland where a further fall is forecast".

Even though their own White Paper says that there is an expected fall in incomes, the Government nevertheless go ahead and cut the grants that were previously available.

I wish to make two detailed points, to which I hope the Minister will respond. As I understand the new provisions, a farmer can no longer apply for ad hoc grants for such measures as reseeding, field drainage or fencing as was previously possible under the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme.

I further understand that, having regard to the monetary limits under the new scheme — the agriculture improvement regulations — a farmer could make applications for assistance up to a limit of two in six years. But that would require the submission of an investment plan.

Given that in the last week the Government have been trumpeting about lifting the burden on small businesses, how can they justify this additional bureaucratic imposition on those who are seeking to do routine maintenance that previously they were able to do more easily because of the ad hoc grant system?

Secondly, I wish to know the extent to which the reduced rates of grant might lead to reduced take-up. Investment plans will not now go ahead, because the money is not available to finance them. How does the level of take-up in April to June this year compare with the same period last year, when the grants were at the higher rate? Will the Minister look again at the rates of grant if it appears that during this financial year the savings to the Exchequer because of the cuts will exceed those that were budgeted for because of the lower rate of take-up? In the light of that, will he review the rate of grant?

Scottish agriculture is also concerned about the reduction in expenditure on the advisory services and research and development. That is a totally insensitive and illogical move at a time when agriculture is in transition. There are ever-increasing needs of the market to improve quality, as well as the need to reconcile farming interests with environmental concerns.

Much time has been spent in the House debating whether the rate of cutback in Scotland was the same as in England and Wales. The advisory services in Scotland do not always perform the same functions as those in England and Wales. But even if they are identical and we are comparing like services with like, that seems to ignore the fact that such a vast cut—41 per cent.—in one go must have a greater impact in Scotland, because of the greater area of Scottish agriculture that is part of less favoured areas, than in England and Wales.

Greater distances must be covered in parts of Scotland, and there is a need for advisory services in less favoured areas where agriculture faces difficulties caused by climate, geography and quality of the land. The great fear in constituencies such as mine is that, if funds are withdrawn or reduced, the type of services that will be cut —particularly for transport cost reasons—will be those to the outlying parts. As a result, the very necessary advice to those areas will be diminished. It was clear to my hon. Friends and me when we saw the Minister of State, the noble Lord Gray, that the sum of 41 per cent. referred to was not negotiable. Now we are debating where the cuts should fall. It is clear that there will have to be considerable rationalisation of the colleges of agriculture and the functions they perform.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I think my hon. Friend will recognise that, having half of the north of Scotland college of agriculture in my constituency, the point he has just raised is of considerable concern to me. That college is talking about the redundancy of 350 experienced specialist advisers who are needed and who will almost certainly have to be re-recruited as and when the reorganisation has taken place. This decision seems to be wasteful of individuals as well as of a natural resource. Will my hon. Friend press on the Minister that, if he will not negotiate the 41 per cent., he must negotiate the timing — the speed with which the change is introduced — to avoid the redundancy and waste of time involved?

Mr. Wallace: My hon. Friend has made a valid point and has stressed the point clearly himself; the Minister will have noted it. He underlines the point, in saying that this will lead to 350 redundancies, that the cuts do not make sense. Indeed, no matter how these cuts are made, clearly parts of Scottish agricultural research and development and our advisory and investigative services — all of which in their own way are vital — will be unacceptably cut. We have already had an Adjournment debate on the valuable work done by the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering, and the fears that it has about a cut in expenditure on research and development.

From the point of view of my constituents, I am greatly concerned about the possible impact of the cuts on the veterinary investigation service, in particular the laboratory at Thurso, which does very valuable work. The veterinary surgeons in my constituency were full of praise for the work done and the service provided to the agricultural community in Caithness, Sutherland, Orkney and Shetland. When the Rayner review looked into this matter in England — Scotland was excluded from its deliberations — it concluded that "the absence of a sophisticated diagnostic and investigational service would represent a serious loss to the industry as a whole. A laboratory based diagnostic service is necessary to support statutory disease eradication schemes and for the identification of new and emergency disease conditions. The private sector would not find it worthwhile to offer the full range of diagnostic and investigational services currently available from the Veterinary Investigation Service."

I can see no reason at all why a similar conclusion should not be applied to Scotland. We will create long-term problems for animal health and welfare if the future of institutions such as the Thurso laboratory and similar laboratories in Scotland is not safeguarded.

The cumulative effect of the cuts will be less assistance in areas where incomes are accepted by the Government to be falling. If investment help is down, that will force the farmers concerned more and more to increase their debt and to have to service debts. In addition, some funding will inevitably be required from the industry to support advisory services, funding from incomes that will be smaller anyway, and in some cases just not there.

How do the Government see the future of Scottish agriculture, when the cumulative effect of their policies are considered? I have no doubt that in his response the Minister will tell us how much the Government is spending on agricultural support in Scotland. One could ask how much would have been spent had these cuts not been made. It sounds almost like a great achievement by the Government that they have not actually cut out agricultural support altogether.

The Minister will also tell us of the increase in amounts payable for hill livestock compensatory allowances, increases which I acknowledge, in particular the supplement in the Highlands and Islands area. I have gone through the figures with NFU representatives in my constituency. It is clear that, if one considers the interrelationship of the increases with the decreases in grants, there is no net benefit at all to the industry. In fact, it is worse off.

I should like to make a constituency point. The grades of land that are used for the payment of allowances in the Highlands and Islands area were based on classifications for winter keep and bear no relation to the problems caused through additional transport and fuel costs or the problems in the remoter parts of Scotland. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will accept that grade A land in Easter Ross is a slightly better proposition when it comes to things such as transport costs and accessibility to markets than grade A land in Orkney. We wish the Minister to reconsider the classifications to see whether they are fair and to ensure that the support is properly going where it is needed.

It is clear that agriculture in Scotland is important not only on its own terms but for the part that it plays in the whole rural economy. If one cuts grants, it is not just the farmer who suffers, but the small contractors who have been undertaking his fencing and drainage work. That has a pervasive effect throughout the rural community. It could put in jeopardy the rural school and other services.

We wish to see a total turnround in Government policy. Support should not be withdrawn. We should be looking forward to such things as an agriculture development programme for the Highlands and Islands, which seek to regenerate the rural economy. There have been signs in the past few weeks that the European Commission is anxious to talk to the Government about the matter. I hope that the Minister will say that the Government will take a more positive approach than in the past. That would be welcome news, because the news over the past 12 months has not been of encouragement and support for Scottish agriculture.

8.31 am

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on his good fortune in raising this important subject. I am grateful for this opportunity to register the strong feelings of the Labour party about the decay of rural Scotland in recent years and indeed about the Government's abject failure to give a proper lead in assisting the Scottish rural economy to come through this time of drastic change and great uncertainty, which everyone acknowledges to be the case.

Apart from agriculture, we have seen the impact of other aspects of Government policy on housing and transport, to name but two, in rural Scotland. the Government must stand condemned for that. As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland said, we need a proper rural development policy not only for the Highlands and Islands but for other rural parts of Scotland. That must include an agriculture policy.

I think that there is general agreement about the urgent need for a drastic review of the European common agricultural policy. However, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is clearly hopelessly out of his depth in addressing himself to the problems. In Scotland, we have the additional problem of having a Minister whom one can only describe as the invisible man responsible for the agriculture industry. In this instance, I am talking not only about the Secretary of State for Scotland himself, but about someone who is even more invisible—Lord Gray of Contin. Perhaps the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) can tell us something about him because I have not seen him since he lost his seat at the last general election.

The Government have conveniently identified a case for cutting expenditure, which they are always keen on doing, and they are turning both their blind eyes to areas of Scottish agriculture and the Scottish rural economy that require extra incentives. Let me give a couple of examples. I start with one mentioned by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. There is a massive attack on the budgets of the Scottish agricultural colleges—a 41 per cent. cut over less than two years. That approach to the research and advisory organisations under present circumstances seems to us to be little short of criminal.

Those organisations can help the industry to adjust itself to the new climate of reduced production, increased emphasis on environmental issues and the general need for diversification and change. If anything, one might think that those colleges needed more resources, but the Government are hell-bent on cutting expenditure regardless of the consequences. We know what is happening to those colleges at present. It has been suggested that money to sustain research and advisory services could be raised from the industry. On the principle of he who pays the piper calls the tune, I suspect that the bigger farmers would be able to benefit from advisory services' research while smaller enterprises, which have the greatest need of it, might not.

Capital grants to agriculture in Scotland, as elsewhere, have been halved in three successive years. For redrainage of land on low ground, capital grant is now 15 per cent. That is not an adequate incentive, even under present circumstances, for vital capital improvement work. Quite apart from the impact that the cuts may have on agriculture, there is cause for acute concern about their disastrous effect on agricultural contractors, who are an important source of employment in rural areas.

We should pay special attention to the most fragile parts of the agricultural economy in Scotland—the hills and uplands. It is essential to sustain employment in those remoter areas. We should consider additional means of protecting existing enterprises in the remoter areas and of creating more smaller farms when possible. To give credit where credit is due, I must add that the Government have responded to pressure to maintain the hill livestock compensatory allowances and the beef and sheep variable premium. That general level of support must continue to guarantee the long-term future of hill livestock farming. I hope that all parties acknowledge that need.

As for the pig industry, we deplore the fact that the Government have refused to accept the recommendation of the Select Committee on Agriculture on the funding of the scheme to eradicate Aujeszky's disease. The Government's failure to underwrite the eradication scheme will make it much more difficult to institute voluntary eradication schemes for animal diseases in future.

The dairy industry will not forgive the Government for the shambolic manner in which production quotas were introduced last year and I do not understand why the Republic of Ireland is getting additional quota of 58,000 tonnes when there is a serious threat of badly needed Scottish milk quota being transferred to Northern Ireland. We must press the Minister for a specific reply and an assurance that Scotland's milk quota will be protected.

We know that there are massive and costly surpluses of cereals in the European Community. We have the grotesque embarrassment of having huge carry-over stocks from last year's harvest still in intervention stores as we begin the 1985 harvest. That is a direct consequence of the distorting effects of the intervention buying system and the common agricultural policy in its present form. We require a massive overhaul of the CAP, not the timid tinkerings that we have had with cereals.

Savings must be made, and there is a need for urgent steps to reduce production and encourage alternative use for land. I suggest that the 1·8 per cent. reduction in prices being imposed by the Commission as a means of circumventing the veto put in by the Germans on the original agreement, will probably be worse than useless. Such a marginal cut in cereal prices is likely to be interpreted as an incentive to increase production, which must be the last thing that we should do.

If the Minister pursues his policy of cutting prices as the means of reducing the production of cereals, he will have to make much bigger cuts, and such substantial cuts could well lead to bankruptcies among smaller producers. That policy is unlikely to succeed. We need a combination of incentives to change patterns of production by the introduction of alternative crops. Price restraint is needed. We must also consider the introduction of quotas. I do not like the idea, but rather than being stampeded into the imposition of quotas, as happened over milk quotas, there should at least be contingency plans for a quota system for cereals.

I have referred to the need for incentives to change production patterns in the rural areas of Scotland. We must encourage people to stop producing commodities that are in surplus. The new agricultural improvement grants that were debated last week in Standing Committee included a new provision for grants and incentives to plant broadleaved shelter belts. During the debate in Committee I raised this point with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. She reiterated the Government's refusal to implement article 20 of the European Community's structures directive which would have provided a very substantial incentive to plant broadleaved trees.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for Scotland said in a written reply that through the Forestry Commission he intended to institute a new planting grant scheme. At first sight this appears to be at least as attractive as the article 20 incentives proposal of the European Community. At least that will be the case for areas of up to three hectares. After that the article 20 incentives would be more generous. Why not implement article 20 in full? European Community cash could then be used to encourage the substantial planting of trees not only in the Highlands but on low ground. The extra planting of trees would not only improve the landscape; it could lead to a significant reduction in the production of cereals and other surplus crops and it would lead to an increase in the production of much needed timber.

There is an urgent need to restrain the production of surplus crops in the European Community. The hamfisted cuts in research and in general support for the industry are typical of this Government's approach, but they are wrong. We should redirect this budget towards restructuring the industry. If savings can thereby be achieved, so much the better. However, our top priority should be the revitalisation of the Scottish rural economy. Scotland contains a high proportion of remote rural areas. Its special case demands special attention in the review of agricultural and rural policy. I fear that that may be too much to expect from this discredited and unrepresentative Government.

8.43 am

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Conscious though I am of the time, I want to place just a one-minute contribution on the record before the Minister replies to the debate. I echo the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on having been fortunate enough to introduce this debate and for the manner in which he did so. I fully endorse the thrust of his argument.

There is great concern in the Ross, Cromarty and Skye constituency and in the Highlands and Islands generally about the envisaged level of cuts in the capital grant scheme and in the agricultural, scientific, research and general support services. My hon. Friend said that it will have a severe impact upon those who farm in the less-favoured areas of the Highlands.

Secondly, an application has been sent from the Highland Regional Council to Lord Gray of Contin requesting 100 per cent. Scottish Office support for the necessary funding of the work that has to be done after the flooding of the River Conon just over a year ago. I hope the Government will seriously consider that request.

Thirdly, may I back up my hon. Friend's plea that there should be a full agricultural development programme for the Highlands of Scotland. Optimistic signals are coming from Europe. There is a clear indication that the European Commission wants to talk to the Scottish Office. I hope that it will respond constructively. It would go a long way towards reversing some of the indebtedness and general difficulty which the agricultural community in the Highlands is experiencing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on his first appearance as the Liberal party spokesman on agriculture in Scotland. In the time available to me, I doubt whether I can cover every point made, but I hope to cover the main ones.

At this early hour—it is almost mid-morning for a farmer—I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman managed to slip his debate into the last of the 12 hours available. It gives me the opportunity to put on record the state and future of Scottish agriculture, and to re-emphasise the Government's excellent record of support to agriculture in Scotland. The industry is in reasonably good shape. Last year, net farm incomes increased by about 32 per cent. to £141 million. Although I am delighted with that improvement, we were careful to say when the figures were published that one should not read too much into single year-on-year comparisons. Many variable factors in agriculture, not least the weather, have a bearing on farm incomes. This year, the weather has been less than kind in many parts of the country.

Since we took office in 1979, the upward trend has become clear. We halted the decline in net farm incomes which we inherited, and then reversed the trend to enable the industry's financial position to recover. The Government can legitimately take the credit for helping the industry to pull itself out of the trough, because we continue to inject large sums of public money into its support. In 1985-86, about £106 million will be paid in direct financial assistance to Scottish farmers. The 1978-79 equivalent was only £73 million. When one considers that, one realises that the remarks this morning of the Lib-Lab alliance were not well-founded.

I suspect that many farmers forget—perhaps some hon. Members have forgotten it, too—that Scotland benefits substantially from the £1·2 billion that is likely to be spent this year in supporting United Kingdom farm prices under the common agricultural policy. Scotland's share of the sum is difficult to quantify but, on the basis of a special exercise carried out in 1983-84, we can place it at about £135 million. Agriculture tends to forget that those sums are part and parcel of the Government's support for the industry. In addition, we spend about £50 million on research and development and education, which benefit agriculture, although less directly.

I am glad that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) mentioned forestry. The Forestry Commission estimates that about £27 million will be spent in Scotland in 1985-86. As my noble Friend Lord Gray noted at the annual general meeting of the Scottish NFU in March, Scottish agriculture now receives about £300 million a year in support. By any yardstick, that is considerable support from the Government and, ultimately, from the taxpayer.

Despite the difficult and protracted price-fixing negotiations this year, the outcome was good for farmers, as the Scottish NFU publicly acknowledged. It is never easy to secure all that we want in those negotiations, and this year was no exception. The continuation of the beef variable premium scheme was especially important to us, and that was certainly recognised by the NFU. The sheepmeat provisions are largely unchanged from previous years, thanks to significant negotiating achievements by the Government. We have resisted attempts to tinker with these schemes. I know that the producers were relieved at the splendid Government achievement in the negotiations.

The real disappointment this year was the failure of the Community to take the right course on cereals. As the House knows, the Germans blocked a proposal to cut cereal prices by 1·8 per cent., and even that proposal had to be seen as a rather weak compromise when related to the 5 per cent. cut due in the light of the Council's sensible 1984 decision on guarantee thresholds.

It is interesting that the hon. Member for East Lothian seemed to be more realistic in facing up to the problems that agriculture will face, and is facing from the problem of surpluses than the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. He rather skidded over the problem of surplus production in the Community, not just on cereals but other products.

It might be interesting for the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland if I read out to him what one one of his leaders said in a debate in January. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) said—[Interruption.] I am glad that hon. Gentlemen are cheering the hon. Member. Perhaps it is the selection of leader that brings a cheer. He said:

"It has been clear for the past five years that a continued open-ended system of agricultural support was bound to lead to trouble, compounded by the seldom mentioned fact that the problem is not just open-ended production with the need for subsidy capping, as it were, but the rapid and expensive result of advances in agricultural technology, as the support system was devised without the expectation of full production or production in balance with demand."—[Official Report, 25 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 911.]

That simple truth does not seem to have penetrated to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, although the hon. Member for East Lothian has got the message, which is particularly relevant to cereals. In a report published by Agra Europe, published on 12 July 1985, it was said:

"Budgetary costs could be trebled by what is a conservative forecast of cereals production of 154 million tonnes by 1990 if present trends in support prices and productivity improvements are permitted to continue. The Commission's own forecast is of a 163 million tonne harvest in 1990, which would mean over a 40 million tonne surplus. Even taking the more conservative figure of 154 million tonnes this would result in EEC support of at least £5,000 million in 1990, roughly 50 per cent. greater than the level which in the milk sector forced farm Ministers into the dairy quota scheme."

The surplus in cereals is a serious problem that we must face up to, and there was more recognition of that in the contribution from the hon. Member for East Lothian than in that from the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland.

The Scottish NFU was clear in all its representations to Ministers about milk quotas. They saw milk quotas as the way ahead. They have got that, and I pay tribute to them and to the Milk Marketing Board for the way we have managed to introduce milk quotas in Scotland, with the minimum trouble, although there are real problems with some milk quotas.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland asked about milk quotas in Northern Ireland. I believe that he is to see my noble Friend later today, as is the president of the Scottish NFU. This matter is under discussion and I am not able to pre-empt the outcome of these discussions.

As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland recognised, the Government are anxious about the future of the small island communities, whose dairy base is dependent on the local creamery. We have looked after the dairy farmers on Islay, Bute, and Kintyre, South of Tarbert, which, for the purposes of the debate, is considered an island. Added on to that is Orkney and Shetland. The hon. Member will know that in Shetland the quotas were not cut last year and will be exempt from the 1 per cent. cut this year.

In Orkney, as in the islands of my constituency, my noble Friend has certainly given an assurance that the quota removed from the islands by the outgoers scheme will be returned this year. We are mindful not just of the needs of individual producers in these areas, but for the need for the cumulative amount of milk in the area to be able to sustain a viable creamery. We have certainly done that and I was pleased to hear the hon. Member acknowledge that fact.

Capital grants have been mentioned and the new grants scheme which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture on 8 July. The hon. Member expressed concern about the proposed rates of support and asked for them to be increased. It is extraordinarily easy for the hon. Gentleman to say that his party can promise more money here, there and everywhere, safe in the knowledge that it will never have to keep the promise which, if kept, would in any case mean higher taxes.

Of course the hon. Gentleman wants more help for his constituents, as we all do, but we also have to recognise that it is those same constituents who have to pay the extra tax, and they will not be too keen to do that. At a time of great pressure on public expenditure, we all have to cut our cloth accordingly, and the farming community understands that. The hon. Member has failed to look at some of the positive features of the new scheme. I stress that these are schemes which not only reflect the decisions of the Government, but stem from our obligations to implement community regulation 797/85.

Among the positive features, I include the proposal to introduce the new schemes on the basis of a clean slate. In other words, farmers will be allowed to spend up to the permitted ceiling regardless of the substantial support which many have received under the AHGS and AHDS schemes. From the representations made by many farmers in my constituency, I know this will be welcomed. Eligibility under the principal new scheme will be extended to small and part time farmers. Aid will be provided for craft and tourism projects in the less favoured areas, and this will permit farmers to augment and diversify their income.

Additional support will be provided for young farmers entering the industry. In addition, we are taking the opportunity to increase standard costs. These provide the basis on which grant is calculated where farmers undertake eligible projects using their own labour. These various measures coupled with general rates of grant of 30 per cent. and 15 per cent. demonstrate not only our continuing commitment to the farming industry, but, with the higher rates of grant — double that in the lowlands — the continuing priority which we are according to the less-favoured areas.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland mentioned plans. Compared with the previous FHDS scheme, the redevelopment plans will be much simpler and less onerous on farmers. I do not consider it unreasonable that farmers applying for grants paid for by the taxpayers should be required to place their applications in the context of a plan, and we are satisfied that two plans in six years will adequately accommodate all the worthwhile developments.

Hon. Members expressed concern about research and development and about the advisory services. As I said the other night, considerable changes are taking place in agriculture. I have mentioned some of them, and there will be more in future as we face the problem of surpluses. There is concern not only about surpluses, but about the environment and its interface with agriculture. There is also pressure to improve the welfare of farm animals, and considerable interest in the relationship between diet and health.

Against that background, it is essential that we review our strategy for research and development, assess the priorities, and see to it that the taxpayer is getting value for money. It is not unreasonable to expect the prime beneficiaries from the fruits of agricultural research and development to make a contribution towards its cost. My Department recently issued a consultation paper in relation to all this which was widely distributed and comments are now being considered.

We recognise the important work carried out by the college advisory service, but we take the view that farmers should make a contribution towards the cost of a service from which they benefit. Even after the reductions are made, the majority of the money, the lion's share, will still come from the public purse. The colleges and the Department are consulting various interests, not least individual farmers. The Department will produce a consultation paper in the early autumn seeking reactions to proposals for implementing the changes which flow not simply from the decision to reduce public funding, but also from the reviews which go along with that.

Of course, I agree that less-favoured areas have particular needs and problems to which we must continue to have special regard. We shall certainly be doing that in all our consultations and considerations.

It being Nine o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Patient Referrals (Cumbernauld)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

9 am

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): This has been a long day, though for Parliament it is still Wednesday — a Westminster eccentricity which must bewilder the outside world. Those of us who have kept the watches of the night, including my hon. Friends the Members for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) and for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), will be relieved that we are at last reaching the end of the sitting.

It would be appropriate for me to place on record on behalf of hon. Members our appreciation of the staff of the House who, with diligence, patience and characteristic courtesy, have seen us through the past eighteen and a half hours.

I shall not detain the House for long, but I have to raise an important constituency matter that is worthy of the time that remains. For a number of years, general practitioners in Cumbernauld new town have been concerned about patient referrals from the new town to hospitals administered by the eastern district of the Greater Glasgow health board and by the Lanarkshire health board.

The principle has always been that doctors used their clinical judgment to determine the best hospital for their patients' needs. That principle has come under increasing pressure because of the growth of the new town and a reluctance by the Glasgow royal infirmary readily to accept emergency admissions. The important requirement for the GPs is that there should be clear and adequate provision both in Glasgow and at Monklands district general hospital. Other hospitals in Lanarkshire, such as Law and Hairmyers hospitals, are not well placed for access from the new town by public or private transport.

The matter came to a head in July 1982, when a Cumbernauld GP received a letter from the eastern district of the Greater Glasgow health board informing him that the substantially open-door policy would continue at the receiving physician's discretion until 5 pm and that at 5 pm or earlier, if there were eight beds or fewer vacant in the medical division, the receiving team would inform the district medical officer or his deputy of the position.

Such was the concern of the GPs that they called a meeting in February 1983 to discuss the future hospital care of Cumbernauld people in view of the reduction in the number of beds at Glasgow. Consultants at Glasgow felt that there would soon come a time when they would be unable to provide a hospital service for Cumbernauld if there were further reductions in the number of beds. Their colleagues from Monklands general hospital said that they could barely cope with the work load from Cumbernauld that they were receiving at that time and would be unable to cope with increased numbers.

The problem is that Monklands general hospital was not built large enough to cope with Cumbernauld's increasing population and cannot cope with more than the numbers that it takes now. If Glasgow stops taking patients, they will have to go to Law and Hairmyers hospitals with increasing frequency.

Doctors asked the chief medical officer for Scotland to their meeting because either Glasgow would have to change its policy of reducing the number of beds, and would have to be given money to provide a service for two thirds of Cumbernauld's population or Monklands general hospital would be trying to cope with a demand which it was not large enough to satisfy.

The chairman of the Lanarkshire health board and the chief area medical officer were asked how they proposed to care for Cumbernauld's population. They replied that they hoped the situation would remain as it had been in the past. However, the Greater Glasgow health board was not prepared to let patients continue to have freedom of choice, and its cut in finances will affect Cumbernauld patients, who will find it increasingly difficult to get into Glasgow hospitals.

There are only two options for Lanarkshire health board in these circumstances. It either extends the Monklands district general hospital or zones Monklands not to accept patients from certain parts of Lanarkshire so that it can have more beds for Cumbernauld patients. As an alternative, Cumbernauld asks that it should be put into the Greater Glasgow health board area, which would mean that the responsibility for taking patients would be that of Glasgow. This would result in its getting more money, and not having to cut the number of beds that it is being forced to cut at present.

These questions were put to the chairmen of both boards, but it appears that the two chairmen failed to agree. Lanarkshire wrote on 19 September that any action that it took would be simply to take up the same stand that it had taken two years previously.

In theory, a complicated administrative procedure has been devised to keep the Monklands hospital doctor receiving the case informed where the patient may be accommodated. In practice, it never works out. In approximately 50 per cent. of medical cases, admission to Monklands hospital is simply refused. That is perhaps fortunate for the people of Cumbernauld, for the scheme as devised might mean admission to Hairmyers hospital or Law hospital. I stress that I am not criticising those hospitals. It is simply that it is not convenient for the people of Cumbernauld to go there. Only when all beds in Lanarkshire are full does the scheme envisage asking Glasgow royal infirmary for help.

Throughout the conduct of this issue, I have had meetings with the doctors. Their representatives and I have met the chairmen and officers of the two health boards. Although these meetings were useful in exploring the difficulties and determining the provisions which exist for my constituents, they did not successfully resolve the central question. In the event, I arranged a meeting with the Minister in an endeavour to obtain ministerial advice to the boards, on which it was hoped they would act so as to resolve the problem.

However, in the last letter which the Minister addressed to me, he merely reiterated that the problem of emergency referrals of Cumbernauld patients was essentially an operational matter for Lanarkshire health board to resolve, in discussion with the Greater Glasgow health board. The Minister stated that Dr. Thomson's letter of 19 September 1984 resolved the uncertainty which had prevailed to that date. He further claimed that the two boards concerned had now clarified the procedure to be followed.

The procedure is, of course, important, but it is not the central issue. The central issue is the capacity of Lanarkshire health board at Monklands general hospital to cope with Cumbernauld referrals, and the willingness and ability of Glasgow royal infirmary to accept unselected referrals from the new town. This has been underlined by a case referred to the royal infirmary by a doctor from Cumbernauld, which was the subject of correspondence between him and that hospital in May this year. It is clear that, if additional cuts continue in Glasgow royal infirmary then, while it will be willing to accept normal gynaecological complaints, patients requiring termination will not be considered.

It is essential that the Minister resolve the matter between the two boards. I hope that he will feel able to say that funding will be such that patients have a choice of which hospital they wish to attend. I hope that he understands that, if the choice is not given, there will shortly come a time when there are insufficient beds for the care of patients from Cumbernauld.

9.9 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr John MacKay): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg), despite the unusual hour, for giving me this opportunity to discuss the particular problem about which he has spoken and to place on record the Government's position on some of the aspects of this issue which are of more general interest and application.

Perhaps it has also given the hon. Gentleman, depending on the decisions of the electorate for the Labour party, a chance to have a say in this House before he takes a vow of silence. But that is something over which Ministers have no control; it is in the hands of the electorate of the Labour party. I shall not say anything about the hon. Gentleman either for or against him in case it damages or even enhances his chances in that election.

However, I will say that the hon. Gentleman has certainly pursued this matter with me both by meetings and by writing and now in this debate.

I think that it is first of all important to establish clearly in a case such as this what are the respective roles of, on the one hand, the Scottish Home and Health Department and, on the other hand, the Health Boards, the Lanarkshire health board and the Greater Glasgow health board. As hon. Members know, the responsibilities of health boards are many and varied, but perhaps the principal reason for their existence is to plan for and provide patient services within the resources which the Government make available to them and in the light of their local requirements and priorities. That latter point is an important one for, provided that there are no national implications, it surely makes sense for the local provision of services to be under the management of a locally-based administrative organisation.

Responsibility for the day-to-day operation and provision of health care services rests with the health boards. In fulfilling that responsibility each health board must, of course, have regard to the requirements of the national policy as laid down by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is ultimately responsible for securing the effective provision of health services, as well as to the constraints necessarily imposed by the availability of resources, whether finance, manpower or indeed fixed assets such as buildings and equipment. In effect, the Secretary of State fulfils his overall responsibility for the provision of health services through the individual health boards in respect of their designated areas.

The fact that each health board is primarily responsible for providing health services to residents within its own area does not, however, mean that boards can afford to operate entirely independently of each other. While it may be a perfectly reasonable objective in terms of long-term planning for a board to devise its services with the needs of its resident population in mind, the pattern of existing services is to a great extent set by the sizes and locations of the hospital buildings actually available, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, by the travel network in the area. That can impose a very real constraint on the day-to-day provision of services. Where one board may have a deficiency of hospital beds, a neighbouring one may have a relative excess, and the logical solution in terms of achieving the best patient care within existing resources is for patients from the former area to cross the boundary into the second area for hospital treatment.

That is recognised in the operation of the Scottish health authorities revenue equalisation mechanism, and this cross-boundary flow is compensated for in the financial allocations we make to the boards. It does not absolve the board from taking primary responsibility for all its residents, nor from devising a strategy for developing its existing services to cater for that resident population. But it does allow a practical solution to be reached where there are imbalances of supply and demand. In each case such a solution depends crucially, however, on the respective boards working together in close co-operation to achieve the best and most practicable service to meet the needs of their residents. Such co-operation is extremely important to the co-ordinated planning and provision of hospital services and I know that nearly all who work in the boards fully appreciate that.

The boundaries of a health board are therefore purely administrative in the sense that, subject to the availability of hospital resources, a patient in one area can be treated in another. It has long been held to be an essential freedom for the general practitioner to be able to decide as he thinks appropriate the best hospital to which to refer his patient. Health boards do their utmost to accommodate that, but the constraints of availability of hospital resources inevitably mean that that freedom cannot be entirely uninhibited. That is not to say that cross-boundary flow is undesirable, but that health boards, for reasons of practicality, may not in all cases be able to provide the full choice of options of hospital care which a general practitioner might ideally wish. Instead, and I am sure that the vast majority of them accept this, the options may be restricted. But the overriding principle of greatest importance is that wherever possible hospital care should be available somewhere with the minimum of delay and with the interests of the patient in mind. That must be the goal to which health boards must strive, and, although we will never be rid of waiting lists entirely, I am sure that boards are continuing to make important progress in that direction.

I turn from that general principle, which is important, on cross-boundary flow and the relationship between adjacent health boards to the particular case of Cumbernauld raised by the hon. Gentleman.

There has been a tradition for patients from Cumbernauld to be referred to Glasgow hospitals and, in particular, to the Glasgow Royal infirmary. Cumbernauld is, of course, in the area of the Lanarkshire health board and it was because of the needs of the Cumbernauld area, as well as those of the Airdrie-Coatbridge area, that a new district general hospital in Airdrie, the Monklands DGH, was built.

Whereas previously there had been substantial cross-boundary flow from Cumbernauld to greater Glasgow, the position has changed somewhat. In 1976, some 88 per cent. of non-emergency, and 73 per cent. of emergency, acute patients from Cumbernauld were treated in Glasgow hospitals mostly at Glasgow Royal infirmary. Following the opening of Monklands DGH, however, these percentages have gradually fallen. The figures for 1982 were down to 72 per cent. for non-emergency cases and only 41 per cent. for emergency cases.

Part of the reason for the trend being gradual is that it takes time for GPs and patients to adjust their referral preferences and practices in the light of new hospital developments. It is inevitable that, for a time, people will continue to rely on the older hospitals. But it appears from the figures that the reputation of Monklands DGH among the people of Cumbernauld is growing. I am glad of that, for Monklands is an extremely efficient and well-run hospital, as I found when I visited it.

The hon. Member approached me about potential problems in the referral of Cumbernauld patients to Monklands in 1983 as he mentioned. We had a useful meeting at the beginning of 1984, when he explained to me that there were fears among the general practitioners in Cumbernauld that the capacity of Monklands to absorb more patients from Cumbernauld was now very limited but that there were signs from Greater Glasgow that they might not be in a position to continue to provide the existing level of service to Cumbernauld.

There was an even more pressing problem, as the hon. Member explained, namely, that Greater Glasgow was now unable to take emergency referrals from Cumbernauld, reversing previous practice, whereas Monklands, it was claimed, could not cope with the additional demand.

As I said at the time when we met, real as these problems were, they were essentially operational matters for the two health boards involved. I remain of that view. As I said, the responsibility for the operation and provision of health services locally lies with the health boards and, provided that they are prepared to work together over common problems in providing those services, this is the best way to overcome them.

I placed emphasis earlier on the importance of co-operation and planning between health boards, and this case illustrates a good example of that. Following my meeting in January 1984 with the hon. Member, I arranged for the Lanarkshire and Greater Glasgow health boards to get together and address the two problem areas outlined, the one being the general admission of acute but non-emergency cases, the other being the specific issue of emergency cases where the situation was more difficult. I am glad to say that after the necessary discussions and consultations, a solution was found by the boards to these problems.

Before I describe those solutions, I will comment on the question of the accident and emergency department at Monklands, which the hon. Gentleman raised in passing. This department has been under some pressure because of unforeseen demand, and the Lanarkshire health board is in the advanced stages of planning the building of an extension to the outpatients' department. The problem of the capacity of the department to deal with those who attend it, largely instead of going to their general practitioners in the first instance, does not bear on the Cumbernauld problem, which is not one of self-referrals. The solution to the general question whether Greater Glasgow will be able to continue its present level of service to residents of Cumbernauld is bound up with Greater Glasgow's plans for future developments in its acute hospital services.

The Greater Glasgow health board is well aware of the financial pressures that it is likely to be under if it does not take steps to reduce its total provision of acute beds to match the rapid decline in the population of its area in recent years and the emergence of hospitals like Monklands outside the area of the Greater Glasgow health board. These hospitals are now taking up patients which traditionally went into Glasgow for their hospital care. These matters are under discussion between the board and my Department but the present assumption is that Glasgow will continue to accept and treat Cumbernauld residents.

In the discussions which followed my meeting with the hon. Member, the Greater Glasgow health board confirmed that despite the speculation to the contrary, it expected to be able to provide the present level of service to Cumbernauld for the foreseeable future. I am glad that the boards were able to clarify the situation in this way and to their mutual satisfaction.

The issue of emergency referrals was more difficult because the Greater Glasgow health board was unable to offer a return to the situation before 1980 when it accepted responsibility for emergency patients from Cumbernauld. Instead, however, Lanarkshire health board was able both to state that it now accepted this responsibility in the first instance itself and to reiterate established procedures which were designed to fulfil that responsibility. These procedures provide for Cumbernauld patients to be referred initially to Monklands DGH. Should there not be accommodation there for them, arrangements are immediately set in hand to find alternative accommodation elsewhere in Lanarkshire, which is primarily at the two large hospitals at Law and Hairmyres. Only in the unlikely event of no suitable bed being available in these main Lanarkshire hospitals is the Glasgow Royal infirmary approached when, with the full agreement of the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board, maximum help will be given. If the procedures are properly followed, the doctor who is looking for the bed should be doing a lot of telephoning. The procedure should be undertaken by the Monklands DGH by keeping a note of the availability of emergency beds — that is something that every large hospital has to do in any event — whether or not it is receiving from Cumbernauld.

Once again, I should point out that these were operational solutions to an operational problem and were sorted out by the two health boards together. I wrote to the hon. Gentleman in October 1984 to explain these solutions and, so far as I am aware, the procedures have operated to the satisfaction of both health boards and no problems have arisen.

I am aware of what the hon. Gentleman has explained, namely, that the general practitioners in Cumbernauld may not be wholly convinced that this is the best service for their patients. It is not always possible to provide every GP with the facility to refer patients to whichever hospital he wishes. There are cases where, as here, the provision of an appropriate service depends on a clearly understood procedure to be followed.

I appreciate that GPs in Cumbernauld and their patients have historically looked to Glasgow, and especially to the Glasgow Royal infirmary, for their health care. However, Cumbernauld is within the Lanarkshire health board area and with the opening of Monklands district general hospital in 1977 the situation changed. The bulk of the non-emergency admissions are still made in the Glasgow Royal, although the proportion has reduced from 88 per cent. in 1976 to 72 per cent. in 1982. For emergency admissions, the proportion has declined from 73 per cent. in 1976 to 41 per cent. in 1982. Lanarkshire health board and Greater Glasgow health board have agreed procedures for Cumbernauld and this must be matched by a willingness on the part of the doctors to follow these agreed procedures. I believe that if that is done there should be no problems for the patients in Cumbernauld, whether they are treated in Monklands district general hospital or in the Glasgow Royal infirmary.

I am happy to reiterate that it has been made clear by the Greater Glasgow health board that despite some of the rumours, which the hon. Gentleman brought to my notice with the doctors he took to see me, it is prepared to say clearly that it is able to take patients from Cumbernauld for the foreseeable future as and when the need to do so arises.

Oral Answers to Questions

Inflation

1. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the range of estimates he has received from major outside forecasters for the likely rate of inflation by the end of 1985.

8. Mrs. Rumbold asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the range of estimates by major outside forecasters available to him for the likely rate of inflation by the end of 1985.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The main outside forecasters on average estimate that inflation as measured by the retail prices index will fall from 7 per cent. now to below 6 per cent. by the end of the year and to 4½ per cent. by the middle of next year.

Mrs. Bottomley: Is this not good news for pensioners, for those looking for work, and for the low-paid, remembering that inflation fuels panic in the elderly, disrupts our competitiveness and gives rise to disputes in pay bargaining? May we be told the average rate of inflation during the past six years compared with the previous five, which included the Lib-Lab pact? Can my right hon. Friend confirm that countries with low rates of inflation also achieve low rates of unemployment?

Mr. Lawson: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend said—she put it exceptionally well. The answer to the question that my hon. Friend was kind enough to include in her supplementary is that since the Conservative Government took office in 1979 inflation has averaged 9½ per cent. as against 15½ per cent. during the lifetime of the previous Labour Government.

Mrs. Rumbold: In the light of my right hon. Friend's sensible response to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), if he were to increase public sector expenditure by putting more money into capital expenditure and the infrastructure, what response would he get from the forecasters of the rate of inflation in the short-term, medium-term and long-term?

Mr. Lawson: There would be no problem if the increased expenditure on infrastructure were on projects which brought a satisfactory rate of return and were offset by reductions in current expenditure, but those who put forward such proposals seldom, if ever, specify which expenditure should be reduced.

As for the proposals of the Labour party to which my hon. Friend may have been referring, I recall that when the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was on the same radio programme as I was some time ago he said that if a Labour Government were to be returned inflation would rise. He did not say—this is an interesting omission—how much it would rise.

Mr. Wainwright: When will the Chancellor of the Exchequer respond to the CBI's request today to come out of his bunker and attack inflation by dynamic means rather than giving the country the worst of all worlds by sticking to negative and purely defensive measures?

Mr. Lawson: I note that the director general of the CBI has temporarily recovered the use of his bare-knuckle script writer. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, as I said in my answer, the rate of inflation is coming down, and coming down well. Whether or not that is dynamic, it is certainly not static.

Mr. Skinner: If the Chancellor of the Exchequer feels it necessary to brag about the rate of inflation being lower than previously, why is it necessary for the Government to give Sir Robert Armstrong an extra £24,000?

Mr. Lawson: That matter has been fully debated in the House and has nothing whatever to do with the rate of inflation.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's principal objective is still to reduce inflation by monetary means? Will he reassure the House that the Government have no intention of joining the fashionable cry for internationally co-ordinated reflation, justified by the desire to reduce the value of the dollar against other currencies?

Mr. Lawson: I am not quite sure about all the ins and outs of my hon. Friend's unusually convoluted question. He is normally direct and succinct. As for the question of the dollar, on which my hon. Friend ended, I think that it would be healthier for the world economy if the disequilibrium in the United States were to be corrected by some further fall in the foreign exchange parity of the dollar. Indeed, that appears to be the view of the American Government also.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Chancellor aware that his knockabout replies are no answer to the serious questions put to him by the CBI? If he really thinks that inflation is falling, why does he not, in the words of Sir Terence Beckett, "abandon economic policies which harm our exports and encourage imports"?

Mr. Lawson: Exports are at an all-time high. Indeed, the latest figures for non-oil exports are running at 10 per cent., in real terms, above a year ago. The hon. Lady should withdraw her ill-informed question.

Company Car Tax

2. Mr. Roger King asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating a revision of the present limit of 1·8 litres for company car tax purposes to 2 litres.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): A number of such representations have been received from motor manufacturers and others.

Mr. King: Will my right hon. Friend accept that when the original 1800 cc cut-off point was fixed, a British manufacturer, namely, BL, had an engine which coincided with a figure just below that? BL does not have that engine now, but has engines of 1·6 and just under 2 litres. Why can we not do something thoroughly chauvinistic, nationalistic and dynamic and make it possible for the cut-off point to help our sole remaining British manufacturer by fixing the point at just under 2 litres?

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend is asking whether we will give careful consideration to the now fairly uniform view of British motor manufacturers that changes should be made. Of course consideration will be given to the request, but, as ever, when changes are made some will gain and some will lose as a result.

Public Expenditure

3. Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is planning any changes in the level of public expenditure.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): No, Sir. The Government have agreed to stick to the public expenditure totals of £139 billion for 1986-87 and £144 billion for 1987-88 published with the Budget.

Mr. Portillo: When the Government next publish new figures on public spending in the Autumn Statement, does my right hon. and learned Friend think that they will publish a fiscal adjustment? Does he agree that fiscal adjustment is given importance way above its merits, that it sometimes sets hares running round in all directions and that it can be damaging to confidence in the economy?

Mr. Rees: I agree with my hon. Friend's analysis. If he and the House look at the Government's response to the eighth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, they will see that we state that the published figure for fiscal adjustment is assigned a significance out of all proportion to its very limited value.

Mr. Bell: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer recall that in his first speech from the Dispatch Box as Chancellor of the Exchequer on that bright confident morning he said:

"an essential ingredient in providing the right balance between fiscal and monetary policies"—

[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Of course I am reading. I am quoting.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not quoting, paraphrasing, please.

Mr. Bell: On that bright confident morning the right hon. Gentleman said that an essential ingredient of the economy was to keep the public sector borrowing requirement under control. Is that the reason why, year in and year out, since he became Chancellor, £3,000 million to £4,000 million worth of national assets have had to be sold? Is that why he is selling them?.

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman directed his question at my right hon. Friend, but I hope that he will allow me to answer it, because it arises from a question that I answered earlier. If the hon. Gentleman studies the public sector borrowing requirement, he will see that, apart from the impact of the miners' strike, it has fallen consistently since 1981. That is a very creditable record.

Mr. Marlow: When will the Government cut public expenditure in real terms?

Mr. Rees: Although some individual items have been cut, that is not our declared policy. Our declared policy is to maintain public expenditure broadly stable in real terms.

Mr. Hattersley: To revert to the Chief Secretary's original answer, does that not confirm—indeed, it does—that the only way in which the Government can finance future tax cuts is by selling more national assets?

Mr. Rees: It seems that the right hon. Gentleman underestimates the merits of privatisation for its own sake. Certainly it is true that the sale of public sector assets has been clearly reflected as an item in the accounts, but as I said, we have achieved significant cuts in direct taxation by other means as well.

International Monetary Fund

4. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to attend a meeting of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): In the first half of 1986.

Mr. Wainwright: Are not Treasury Ministers ashamed that they and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not attending the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank? Why will they dally in the bunker of the Conservative party conference when the world is crying out for a lead to bring it out of financial anarchy?

Mr. Stewart: The United Kingdom will be fully represented at those meetings. Surely, the hon. Gentleman would expect the leaders of his own party to be present at his party conference. I would agree with that sentiment. Despite the rather aggressive nature of the hon. Gentleman's question, and as this may be the last time that he will appear as the economic spokesman for the Liberal party, may I say that we wish him well in his job in employment. I hope that he will take an early opportunity to say how glad he is to see the rapid rise in new jobs that has occurred during the past two years.

Mr. Merchant: When my hon. Friend—or my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—next meets his friends—or enemies—in the IMF, will he remind them that employment in Britain rose by 650,000 in the past two years—more than in the rest of the EEC put together? Will he proffer advice to other countries on how to manage their economy?

Mr. Stewart: I am sure that my right hon. Friend has noted my hon. Friend's suggestion. It is indeed true that this country's successful economic policies have generated a much more rapid rise in employment than has taken place in most other industrial countries. The proportion of people of working age at work is higher in this country than in any other industrial countries, except Japan and America.

Personal Taxation

5. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the lowest income at which a single person with only a personal allowance is currently paying less income tax than in 1978-79.

Mr. Hayhoe: With the exception of those earning between £2,720 and £5,330 a year, all single taxpayers whose earnings have increased in line with the national average are currently paying less income tax as a proportion of their earnings than in 1978-79.

Mr. Meadowcroft: But is it not the case that a person has to earn over £22,000 a year before he pays a smaller proportion of his salary in tax and national insurance? Why do the Government give benefits to people who earn more than that amount, instead of giving benefits to those who earn less than that? Surely that is highly objectionable when we are trying to make people conform with policies to control the serious economic problems of this country?

Mr. Hayhoe: I think that most people are concerned about their real take-home pay. There has been a real increase in take-home pay for all those whose pay has risen in line with national average earnings since 1978-79.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Notwithstanding the increase in income tax thresholds that the Government have achieved, does my hon. Friend agree that the burden of taxation still rests heavily on the lowest paid? Does he further agree that people—for example, members of the alliance parties—who call for higher public expenditure on a cause—however worthy it may be—are calling for an increase in taxation of the poorest members of our society?

Mr. Hayhoe: I endorse what my hon. Friend says. In reply to what he said about the burden on the low-paid, may I point out that, as a result of the changes in recent Budgets, personal allowances have been increased by 20 per cent. in real terms. Moreover, the changes in the national insurance regime announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his last Budget were of particular help to the low-paid.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

6. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further discussions he has had with the Bank of England concerning Johnson Matthey Bankers.

14. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement regarding Johnson Matthey Bankers.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend discussed with the Governor the terms of his statement of 17 July, to which I refer the hon. Members.

Mr. Alton: Will the Economic Secretary tell the House how many heads have rolled at the Bank of England as a result of the Johnson Matthey fiasco? As his right hon. Friend told the House that the Bank was too busy to investigate the gaps in the Johnson Matthey records, will he tell us why he did not call in outside assistance?

Mr. Stewart: Staff appointments at the Bank of England are a matter for the Governor of the bank. My right hon. Friend did not say that the present management of JMB was too busy. He said that the affairs of the bank were in a chaotic state and that it took a long time to establish that there were gaps in the documentation.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in view of the dilatoriness shown by the Chancellor, the Governor of the Bank of England and all the others in this affair, it would not be taken well if the taxpayer had to foot the legal bill incurred by the Chancellor because of recent events? If the Chancellor is prepared to use more than £100 million of taxpayers' money for this rescue, is it not wrong for the taxpayer also to have to foot the bill for the legal expenses arising out of the writ?

Mr. Stewart: Contrary to what the hon. Gentleman suggests, my right hon. Friend has been punctilious in reporting to the House on the JMB affair. Indeed, last week he made a statement as soon as it became clear that the JMB management wished to invite the City of London police to conduct a preliminary inquiry. As to the writ, I should point out that a writ was served on the auditors on Tuesday, and in response a writ was served by the auditors on my right hon. Friend. That writ will be vigorously contested.

Mr. Marlow: Does my hon. Friend agree that the most important aspect of this affair is the confidence of the City of London and that it was right for the Bank of England to intervene? Is it not also right for the Government to uncover what went wrong so that it does not recur? Is it not least important to make political capital?

Mr. Stewart: There is a lot to be said for my hon. Friend's remarks. Clearly, important lessons have been learnt about banking supervision, and that was the subject of my right hon. Friend's statement to the House on 20 June.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister accept that some of us do not think that the technical officers of the Bank of England were at fault? Will he confirm his total confidence in Mr. Walker and Mr. McMahon?

Mr. Stewart: I do not propose to be led into making comments from the Dispatch Box on any individual official.

Customs and Excise Office, Wick

7. Mr. Robert Maclennan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to the future of the present Customs and Excise area office at Wick.

Mr. Hayhoe: As I told the hon. Member in my letter of 15 July, the Wick office is to remain fully operational.

Mr. Maclennan: In view of the excellent facilities at Wick airport and the desire of local development agencies, local authorities and business men to develop links with Scandinavia to promote commerce and tourism, will the Minister view with favour any request to increase customs services at the airport to meet those desirable objectives?

Mr. Hayhoe: The question of customs facilities at the airport is rather different from the question that the hon. Gentleman placed on the Order Paper. When I last reviewed the position at the airport, the amount of traffic did not meet the criteria laid down for customs attendance.

Mr. Kennedy: Is the Minister aware that during a recent Transport Question Time the Minister with responsibility for aviation said that he would be willing to look at the position at Wick and Inverness airports? Is he also aware that in a letter to me of this week he confirmed that the 12 per cent. cut in the number of customs officials since 1979 is only now beginning to be reversed? Is not one of the difficulties the fact that the Government, even if the Treasury makes that welcome facility available, will only be beginning to reverse the problems generated by their policies?

Mr. Hayhoe: Discussions have been going on for a long time about customs attendance at both Wick and Inverness airports. If the criteria for attendance are met, the customs will be in attendance.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that proper customs facilities for a wide range of airports in the United Kingdom, including Wick, are necessary for the good conduct of business? Will he make it a Government priority to maximise the use of provincial airports, including those in the Highlands, to which this question refers?

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. I am all for maximising the use of airports and of resources. Because I am concerned with the maximisation and utilisation of customs resources, I do not want to see them deployed where they will not be fully efficient.

Black Economy

9. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the most recent estimate of the percentage of national income represented by the black economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: Recent estimates of the size of the black economy have varied from 2 to 16 per cent. of gross domestic product. This very wide range tends to confirm the Government's view that it is not possible to form any reliable estimate of its size.

Mr. Atkinson: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the long overdue bonfire controls on small businesses, recommended by the recent White Paper, "Lifting the Burden", will do much to reduce the size of the black economy? Will he give some thought now to introducing a two-year honeymoon, free of corporation tax, to encourage all new business to become better established?

Mr. Rees: I note my hon. Friend's suggestion about a two-year honeymoon. I doubt whether it would be the most effective way of helping small businesses. Indeed, many new businesses do not make much profit in the first two years. The most positive assistance that the Government can give to the smaller end of the economy, as my hon. Friend has perceptively pointed out, is our firm determination to lift the burden on it. As the House will know, measures will be co-ordinated by a committee presided over by my noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that because of the Government's enthusiasm to tackle the informal economy many reputable small firms are being unfairly victimised? Is he not aware that those people are the real wealth creators? Will he ensure that before their accounts are investigated someone very senior satisfies himself that there are reasonable grounds for suspicion?

Mr. Rees: If my hon. Friend will draw our attention to any cases where there has been victimisation, I am sure that we shall make the fullest possible investigation. As he will see from the latest report of the Board of Inland Revenue, the board has concentrated on the larger, rather than the smaller, accounts.

Exchange Rate

10. Mr. Weetch asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the exchange rate.

Mr. Lawson: At noon today the sterling index stood at 84·3.

Mr. Weetch: Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer read in today's press the criticism by the director general of the CBI, Sir Terence Beckett, of the rise in the exchange rate? He says that if the exchange rate goes any higher it will unfairly threaten the competitive position of British firms in foreign markets. Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that a few years ago, because of a sharp rise in the exchange rate, which was totally artificial, many soundly based firms in this country ran into serious difficulties? Will the Chancellor tell the House whether he has an exchange rate policy and what it is?

Mr. Lawson: I recall that when sterling was temporarily falling during the early part of this year I was called to the House to answer a private notice question tabled by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who was complaining about the fall. Now I see that the Labour party is complaining about the subsequent recovery.

Mr. Maples: In retrospect, does my right hon. Friend not think that a good time to have joined the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS might have been around the end of January, when the pound-deutschmark exchange rate was about 3·5?

Mr. Lawson: The fundamental question about the EMS is not particularly the exchange rate at which one joins, although that is obviously a matter of significance, but whether it is in the interests of this country to join at all. As my hon. Friend will know, we keep that matter constantly under review, but at the present time we do not think that it is in this country's interests to join.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Chancellor seems intent on using the rising pound and record real interest rates to recreate the economic disaster of 1979 to 1981. Is he aware that the pound is now more than 50 per cent. undervalued in real terms against the deutschmark compared to the average of 1973 to 1976, and that our deficit in manufactured trade with the EEC is now higher than the entire EEC deficit in manufactured trade with Japan? How can we improve the situation with the pound at that valuation?

Mr. Lawson: The plain fact is that our exports, including our non-oil exports, are at records levels and that our balance of payments on current account is in surplus for the fifth or sixth — I think the fifth — year in succession. We are also in our fifth year of steady growth. We have the highest expected growth rate of any country in the Common Market, and it is also higher than that of the United States. If that is a disaster, it is the sort of disaster which the previous Labour Government would have given their eye teeth to get.

Mr. Eggar: Given the present monetary conditions, as measured by MO, what possible reason is there for not reducing interest rates and thus influencing exchange rates?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend will be aware that interest rates have already fallen by 2 per cent. from their peak earlier this year, and the future course of interest rates will be affected by what happens on the foreign exchange markets.

Mr. Terry Davis: Will the Chancellor tell us whether the value of the pound is the result of a deliberate policy decision by the Government, or whether it is simply due to drift?

Mr. Lawson: This is the first time that I have heard of such a recovery being attributed to drift. Although I am happy to accept the Government's responsibility for taking the exchange rate into account in their monetary and financial policy, as they must, they do not have the power to set a particular exchange rate. That is set by the foreign exchange markets.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Chancellor accept that the levels of domestic interest rates are influencing the exchange rate? Will he listen to the widespread anxieties of industry about increased levels of unemployment and about liquidations later this year if the present levels of interest rates and the present exchange rate continue?

Mr. Lawson: The present exchange rate is almost exactly what it was at the time of the last general election in 1983. Had we taken the advice given during the election campaign by the Social Democratic party and joined the EMS at the then rate, that would have been a fixed rate and we should have remained at it until now. I fail to see what the hon. Gentleman is complaining about.

Interest Rates

Mr. Ray Powell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the impact of the current levels of interest rates on inflation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The current level of interest rates is maintaining downward pressure on the rate of inflation.

Mr. Powell: Is it not time that the Minister tried to examine yet again the economic policies that the Government are pursuing? Is he aware that hon. Members on both sides of the House are expressing the alarm and concern that was expressed earlier this week in the Division on the top salary increases? What effect will the top salary increases have on demands by the trade union movement for an increase in wages and salaries? When will the Minister try to get his calculations right and get his predictions out of a twist? Is it not time that the Minister seriously considered the effect of the Budget, which his right hon. Friend called a Budget for employment, but which, especially in my constituency, turned out to be a Budget for unemployment?

Mr. Stewart: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman underestimates the importance of the changes in the tax threshold and in national insurance contributions which my right hon. Friend announced in the Budget. They have important implications for jobs and, as I remarked earlier this afternoon, the numbers of people in employment are rising rapidly.

If I may be permitted to come back to the subject of the question, I point out to the hon. Gentleman that it is the Government's policy to maintain interest rates at whatever level — but not above that level — is needed to exert downward pressure on inflation. [Interruption.] In loosening monetary conditions today we do not want to encourage further inflation tomorrow.

Mr. Dickens: Following his royal highness' remarks on the ITN news at lunchtime, does my hon. Friend accept that we are moving towards a home-ownership democracy in this country and that, as such——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question must be related to inflation.

Mr. Dickens: It is. Does my hon. Friend agree that the tax relief on mortgage interest payments is an important part of the encouragement given to people to stand on their own feet and to own the house in which they live? That being so, will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to tell people today——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should have thought about his question before he asked it.

Mr. Blair: What price does the Economic Secretary say that we shall have to pay for this high interest rate policy in terms of mortgage costs, company liquidations and the cost to industry? As Treasury forces, not market forces, are keeping interest rates at their present artificially high levels, can the hon. Gentleman tell us when they will be reduced to the levels enjoyed by our main competitors?

Mr. Stewart: I remind the hon. Gentleman that interest rates have already been reduced by 2 per cent. from their level at the time of the Budget. There are always difficulties that raising interest rates cause in the short run, but the difficulties caused in the long run by a failure to take appropriate action on monetary conditions are far greater.

National Wealth

12. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the overall change in the level of the nation's wealth since 1979.

Mr. Lawson: By the time of the Budget, the nation's real output was 6 per cent. higher than in 1979, and growth this year is expected to be the fastest in the European Community and to exceed that of the United States as well.

Mr. Greenway: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on those substantial achievements. Is it not a fact that more schools, hospitals and nurses, and higher pay for everyone, are best achieved by increased wealth, rather than by much higher personal taxation and the punitive taxation of ordinary people's pension funds which have been earned through a lifetime of work, which is proposed by the Labour party?

Mr. Lawson: The Labour party's proposals on pension funds are as obscure as its proposals on a number of other policies, such as the compulsory repurchase of shares in privatisation issues and the unfettered right to buy council homes. No doubt they will be made clear in due course.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the only way in which we can have social services of the kind that we would all like to see in this country is by first generating the wealth that will pay for them.

Mr. Dubs: How much of the increase in our wealth since 1979 has been due to North sea oil?

Mr. Lawson: A very small part. Of the rate of growth of about 3 per cent. a year that we have seen since the trough of the recession, about ½ per cent. has been due to North sea oil. The other 2½ per cent. has been due to the onshore economy.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the growth rate in this country would have been greater if the tax burden had been lower, but that that could have been achieved only if the burden of public spending had been lower? Does he therefore agree that it would be a jolly good thing if our right hon. Friend the Chief Whip were to call the spending Ministers into his office in groups of six and give them a good talking to about loyalty to the Government's objectives?

Mr. Lawson: I note that that particular tactic by my right hon. Friend the Chief Whip did not have much effect on my hon. Friend.

Interest Rates

13. Mr. Hayes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will next be having discussions with the Governor of the Bank of England about interest rates; and if he will make a statement.

15. Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

Mr. Lawson: The Governor and I regularly discuss interest rates in the context of the monetary policy and conditions. Short-term interest rates have fallen by around 2 per cent. since January. Rates will continue to be held at whatever level is needed to maintain monetary conditions that will keep steady downward pressure on inflation, but no higher than that.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that an attitude of excessive caution towards interest rates can only damage prospects for employment and economic recovery? Does he further agree that a 2 per cent. cut in mortgage rates would cut inflation by 0·6 per cent. and help industry to contain its costs?

Mr. Lawson: It is the responsibility of industry to contain its own costs. It must accept that responsibility, and it cannot look to advantageous reductions in mortgage rates—much as we would wish to see those—to do the job for it.

Mr. Hirst: While I welcome the recent reduction in interest rates, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether he agrees that real interest rates are still too high and constitute a severe disincentive to businesses and home buyers? In view of the more encouraging predictions about inflation and the recovery of sterling, what hope does he hold out for a reduction in interest rates later this year?

Mr. Lawson: I hold out hope that there will be a reduction in interest rates at the appropriate time. However, if there is one thing substantially worse than the present, relatively high real rates of interest—although they are not so very much higher than in other countries—it is the negative real rates of interest that obtained during the inflationary 1970s. No capitalist society or economy can survive with rates such as those.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the Chancellor explain why our interest rates are not only at record real levels but are one third higher than those in the EEC and double those in Japan? Will he further explain why every mortgage, hire purchase contract, overdraft and unit of local government is being crippled by high interest rates just to keep the pound at an overvalued level?

Mr. Lawson: There is no way of controlling monetary policy without holding interest rates at a level high enough to keep that control; and there is no way of controlling inflation without having proper control of monetary conditions.

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a 1 per cent. cut in interest rates would improve the competitiveness of British industry to the extent of £250 million in a year? Does he further agree that if we could achieve a 1 per cent. cut in labour costs the benefits to British industry would exceed £1,000 million a year?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend's comparison. Indeed, I recall drawing that comparison myself on an earlier occasion, but it certainly bears repetition. His remarks point to an important problem in our economy— the high rate of growth in labour costs per unit of output in this country compared with that of our main competitors overseas.

National Economic Development Council

16. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to meet the National Economic Development Council to discuss the management of the economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend will chair the meeting of the NEDC on 25 September next.

Mr. Lloyd: Will the Chancellor tell the National Economic Development Council that the Government have abandoned manufacturing industry, thereby abandoning regions such as the north of England, Scotland, the midlands, Wales and Northern Ireland, all of which have traditionally depended on that industry? When will the Government take seriously the plight of the unemployed in those areas?

Mr. Rees: My right hon. Friend will give no such message to the NEDC, because it would be totally inaccurate. For example, I remind the House that the investment survey of the Department of Trade and Industry shows that there will be a 10 per cent. increase in manufacturing investment in 1985.

Sir Peter Tapsell: A central feature of economic management that has always been required by the medium-term financial strategy has been that the PSBR should represent an ever-falling proportion of GDP. When our right hon. Friend the Chancellor next meets the National Economic Development Council, will he explain both to it and to the country why we now have a PSBR that is proportionately among the lowest of any industrial country, combined with an interest rate structure that is double that of most of our industrial competitors?

Mr. Rees: As a matter of fact, my hon. Friend should note that the German deficit as a proportion of GDP is lower than ours. Their industrial performance—and it gives me no pleasure to say so—is also rather better than ours.

European Monetary System

17. Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry in 1985 on the United Kingdom joining the European exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The CBI has stated that its present view is that the United Kingdom should join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Freeman: Does my hon. Friend agree that our excellent export performance can be improved only if business men believe that we have stable interest rates, particularly in relation to our European partners? Does he also agree that one way of achieving stable exchange rates is for Britain to announce at an early moment that we will join the exchange rate mechanism?

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor explained a while ago that the Government's policy is to keep the question of membership of the EMS under review and that we have not judged that circumstances are right for us to join. My hon. Friend referred to both interest and exchange rates. The greater the stability with one, the greater the likelihood of instability with the other.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Allen Mckay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. Following my duties in the House, I shall be leaving for a brief visit to Washington.

Mr. McKay: In view of what happened at the trials of mineworkers in Sheffield recently, and in view of the right hon. Lady's statement that it would be better to go down in history as a compassionate lady rather than as the iron lady, should she not use her good offices now to persuade the National Coal Board to use the board's time-tested, time-tried and time-trusted conciliation and consultation machinery, which dealt with similar cases prior to the

The Prime Minister: I believe that we have plenty of machinery for the Coal Board to deal with colliery closures or with appeals against dismissals, as the hon. Gentleman is well aware. With regard to his earlier remark, one sometimes needs a touch of steel. There is nothing wrong with that. Sometimes one needs a good deal of compassion, and there is nothing wrong with that either.

Mr. Wiggin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that tomorrow, while the media of Bristol are occupied with the Queen's visit, the Secretary of State for the Environment will be announcing his decision on the Avon county structure plan? This decision is not likely to be acceptable to the people of the county of Avon, and especially to my constituents. Will my right hon. Friend instruct her Ministers to listen, and perhaps set an example herself by listening, with much greater care to the views of her supporters? Otherwise, she will not have so many of them.

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend feels strongly about the Avon structure plan, and also about certain matters of planning and development. I think that he and my colleagues will be the first to understand that it is difficult to strike a balance between those who do not wish there to be much more planning permission in a particular area, and those who wish to make provision for more jobs and more housing for certain purposes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have to strike that balance, and I hope that my hon. Friend will be satisfied with what he does when the announcement is made.

Mr. Hattersley: While the Prime Minister is in America, will she tell Vice President Bush why we, unlike the United States, have not withdrawn our ambassador from South Africa? Will she tell him why we, unlike the Congress and Senate of the United States, have not attempted to ban new investment in that apartheid regime?

The Prime Minister: While these events are taking place in South Africa, it is important that we have first hand reviews of them from our ambassador there. We can carry out a considerable duty in doing that.

I believe that the US Administration is against sanctions and disinvestment, and the right hon. Gentleman will be aware of what Helen Suzman recently said about them:

> "Many are presently under consideration with disinvestment and sanctions much to the fore. Campaigns and such actions have indeed reached tidal wave proportions in the United States of America. If I thought that these would work, they would have my unconditional support."

Mrs. Suzman went on:

> "Not only do I not believe these campaigns would be effective; I believe they would be counter-productive."

Mr. Hattersley: At first hearing that seems like the feeblest sort of excuse, but I have no doubt that the Prime Minister believes her answer, because she is wholly incapable of understanding the importance of giving a moral lead on this or any other matter.

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman could, likewise, accuse Mrs. Helen Suzman of failing to give a moral lead. She was very clear in the advice that she gave. The Government believe that it is correct, and that sanctions would hit the black population of South Africa very badly and, as Mrs. Suzman said, be counter-productive. That is the view that we shall continue to hold.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Will my right hon. Friend note with satisfaction that last year this country gave £95 million for famine relief aid, without reducing other aid programmes? Nevertheless, does she agree that our long-term aid programme is for development, and will she say that she will not allow that programme to suffer?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. The greater part of the aid programme goes to capital development and is tied to jobs in this country. I believe that most people in the House would agree with that. We also give a considerable amount to the poorer countries. Nevertheless, a considerable fund is set aside for disaster relief, and there is a contingency fund. I believe that we have very good arrangements for aid. The amount of aid that we give, coupled with the amount that goes privately and with private investment, gives this country an excellent record on its all-round aid programme.

Mr. Steel: When the Government Chief Whip on Tuesday night offered the prospect of the Prime Minister's resignation, did he do so with, or without, her authority?

The Prime Minister: I have to disappoint the right hon. Gentleman. I am here, and will remain here. I am delighted to suffer attacks from the right hon. Gentleman. It means that I am usually right.

Q2. Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Nellist: Before the Prime Minister leaves this afternoon to address the Capitalist Internationale, will she comment on today's report on the inquiry into British housing, which specifically criticises the Government's single-minded emphasis on owner-occupation as having certain dangers? [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".] Does she not recognise that it is at least true for working-class families in areas such as Coventry and Liverpool, and for others whose councils' funding will be cut later this afternoon? Before the Prime Minister leaves the country, will she give a guarantee that she will meet the wives and families of Liverpool councillors, who are in the House this afternoon and who handed in such a request to No. 10 Downing street at 2 o'clock?

The Prime Minister: Before I leave this afternoon I shall be happy to respond to the hon. Gentleman by giving some of our record on housing. Since May 1979, more than 450,000 local authority and new town dwellings have been renovated — a higher number than in previous years. Secondly, 50 per cent. more homes were renovated with the help of grants between 1979 and 1984 than in the previous five years. Thirdly, during our time the dwelling stock has risen by 1·1 million houses, and 1·25 million new homes have been built since 1979. I can go on longer if the hon. Gentleman wishes me to do so.

Mr. Dickens: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to confirm that the Government have no intention of tampering with the tax relief given on mortgage interest payments?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to repeat what I have frequently said from this Dispatch Box and shall be saying many times in the future. So long as I am here, tax relief on mortgages will continue.

Q3. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stewart: In view of the opposition in Scotland to the sale of the Trustee Savings bank in Scotland, and in the light of the litigation before the Court of Session, will the Prime Minister give a categorical undertaking to the House that no legislation in this place will pre-empt or stultify the findings of the Scottish court?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the findings of the Scottish court must be obeyed. If the House wished to bring forward any further legislation, that would be a matter for the House.

Mr. Watts: Is my right hon. Friend aware that out of about 4,500 people in my constituency who are claiming unemployment benefit, only 418, fewer than one in 10, have bothered to register their skills with the jobcentre, where more than 800 vacancies are available? Will she discuss with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment the advisability of reintroducing the registration of the unemployed at jobcentres, especially in areas such as my constituency of Slough, where there are serious skill shortages?

The Prime Minister: I am very much aware of the position in my hon. Friend's constituency, where, although there are considerable numbers of unemployed, there are, nevertheless, considerable skill shortages. We are considering how best to deal with this matter and at present it is not our intention to require registration at jobcentres. One of the problems is that many of the jobs which are available are not registered at jobcentres, as employers prefer to fill them direct. However, we are reviewing the whole matter and I am grateful for my hon. Friend's views.

Q4. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Clwyd: Before the Prime Minister leaves the country today, will she reflect on the fact that the majority of my constituents hope that she will never come back?

The Prime Minister: I hope that they will be disappointed, but I cannot believe that the hon. Lady would necessarily say that of the majority of her constituents, who, I believe, would relish political debate.

Q5. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: With regard to the United Kingdom's relationship with the Turkish Government, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend, notwithstanding the disappointment that we had when we failed to get the contract for the Bosphoros bridge, will acknowledge that a letter sent to her by the Prime Minister of Turkey shows that there is tremendous trade potential over a number of projects? Would my right hon. Friend care to share with the House the view that tremendous business opportunities exist between this country and Turkey?

The Prime Minister: As I think my hon. Friend is aware, exports to Turkey rose last year and continued to rise in the first five to six months of this year. We believe that there are good export opportunities and we are, therefore, keeping under review the amount of medium-term credit.

Mr. Spearing: Is the Prime Minister aware that the minutes of the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee yesterday, and the events surrounding the weekend of 1 and 2 May 1982, show that some members of the Committee prevented others from putting questions to her in writing? Will she now answer one of them, namely, what was the purpose and object of the second visit of the then Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), to Washington and New York over the period of that second fateful weekend?

The Prime Minister: I have given very full answers on this matter in the past. I have nothing more to add except to say that we debated the matter on 18 February 1985 when the House voted by 351 votes to nil

"That this House recognises that the sinking of the General Belgrano was a necessary and legitimate action in the Falklands Campaign; and agrees that the protection of our Armed Forces must be the prime consideration in determining how far matters involving national security and the conduct of military operations can be disclosed."—[Official Report, 18 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 737.]

None of the four hon. Members who signed the minority report of the Select Committee voted against that motion.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for the first week after the summer Adjournment?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The business for the first week after the summer Adjournment will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on industrial innovation and design on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Second Reading of the Housing Bill [Lords], the Housing Associations Bill [Lords], the Housing (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords] and the Landlord and Tenant Bill [Lords] which are all consolidation measures.

Proceedings on the Weights and Measures Bill [Lords] which is also a consolidation measure.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 22 OCTOBER — Remaining stages of the European Communities (Finance) Bill.

Motion on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 3) Order.

WEDNESDAY 23 OCTOBER — Opposition Day (20th Allotted Day). The subject of debate is to be announced.

Motion on the Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies (Northern Ireland) Order.

Motion on the Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order.

THURSDAY 24 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on a motion to take note of the outstanding reports of the Committee on Public Accounts to which the Government have replied.

Motion on the European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation) Order and the European Communities (Immunities and Privileges of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation) Order.

FRIDAY 25 OCTOBER — There will be a debate on alternative sources of energy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may also be asked to consider any other Lords amendments and messages which may be received.

It may be for the convenience of the House if I indicate that Government business will also be taken in the week beginning 28 October. It is expected that the new Session will be opened on Wednesday 6 November.

Mr. Hattersley: After yesterday's report by Mr. Justice Popplewell on the safety and security of football grounds, will the Government make a statement, later today or tomorrow, on what further action they propose to enhance safety and security? The football season is barely a month away and funds are not available to meet the suggestions in the Popplewell report.

Secondly, presumably between now and our return, the Foreign Office will be preparing its reply to the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs into the sinking of the General Belgrano. Is it the intention of the Foreign Secretary to prepare comments on the minority as well as the majority report?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the Popplewell statement yesterday was very comprehensive and enabled the House to consider the topic. I will draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the right hon. Gentleman's point.

I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to any observations that the right hon. Gentleman may make on the Select Committee's report.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are laws in this country on discrimination against blacks, women and the disabled? That is quite right. Does my right hon. Friend think that it is time that, given the problem of unemployment, there was a debate in the House on discrimination against those who are over 50, who are able but who do not get jobs because of the system?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a point that may well be considered in the new Session. No doubt he realises that, at the beginning of the new Session especially, there will be ample opportunity to make many speeches on these topics without there necessarily being a specific debate.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): When we return, may we have a debate on pay comparability in the public sector, as by then the implications of the Government's decision on top salaries will have fed into all the negotiations taking place in the public sector, including the teachers' negotiations, and we shall need to discuss the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I have no doubt that the topic referred to by the hon. Gentleman will very much feature in the political debate come October, but no doubt he realises that no specific provision has been made for it during the first week of the new Session.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is it the Government's intention to continue sittings of the House throughout the week of 28 October until such time as the Water (Fluoridation) Bill is secure, or do they intend to drop the beastly and unpopular measure?

Mr. Biffen: I think that it was Asquith who said, "Wait and see", but, even if it was not, it is a very good answer.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): In her speech to the American Bar Association, the Prime Minister said that this country must provide no haven or escape for terrorists. Is the Leader of the House aware that five Italian Right-wing terrorists who were convicted in Italian courts are living in this country, and that there appears to be no desire by the Government to deport them or remove them? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that, in a letter to me, the Home Secretary gave as one of the reasons for inaction the fact that EC law makes their removal difficult? If that is so, may we have an early report on the implications of this matter, because I find it astonishing, as do many hon. Members, that EC law should make it impossible for us to remove convicted Fascist terrorists from this country?

Mr. Biffen: I am aware of the facts that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, not least because of press coverage. I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to the point that the hon. Gentleman raises.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): As we have begun this afternoon to look once again down the long vista of a new Session, in which, if nothing is done, we shall no doubt again suspend our Ten o'clock rule on three nights out of four, and as the Procedure Committee has suggested some very important measures which would enable the House to conduct its business in a somewhat more civilised and no less effective manner, may we have an early opportunity of discussing that debate and of the House expressing its views on the recommendations?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of the point that my hon. Friend has made, but no provision has been made for it in the business announced today.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): As the Government are in a state of complete disarray, instead of working out the programme for after the recess, surely they ought to call it a day before the whole nation finishes up in the knacker's yard.

Mr. Biffen: Life must look very jaundiced from where the hon. Gentleman sits; when I look across the House, I understand why.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Is it the Government"s intention, either in the tail end of this Session or early in the next, to give the House an opportunity to discuss the possibility of televising its proceedings?

Mr. Biffen: I have already given what I considered to be a clear indication of what I hope the progress will be in this matter. I do not think that I can helpfully add to it.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Has the right hon. Gentleman had time to read early day motion 915 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell)?

[That this House calls upon the Government to honour their legal obligation as signatories of the 1960 Treaty of Establishment which guaranteed the Sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus, recognising that on 20 July 11 years will have lapsed since the invasion of Cyprus by Turkish military forces that still occupy 40 per cent. of the island despite repeated resolutions from the United Nations with the unanimous support of the Security Council demanding their withdrawal; further expresses grave concern regarding the 200,000 Greek Cypriots who are deprived of their homes, land and property and made refugees in their own country; regards this unique situation in the 20th century as most intolerable; urges positive action to find an equitable solution to the problem for the people of Cyprus; and demands further stronger international pressure so that justice and freedom can prevail.]

Will the Government find time to debate the situation in Cyprus? It is now more than 11 years since Turkish troops invaded the island. Is it not time that the House debated the situation there?

Mr. Biffen: The situation in Cyprus and all that derives from the invasion is certainly a matter which constantly demands the attention of the House. However, no Government time is available for a debate in the week when we come back.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): My right hon. Friend is aware of the growing concern in British manufacturing industry about the increasing difficulties of winning competitive contracts owing to the concessionary credit being accorded by foreign Governments. Will there be an early statement on the Government's intentions about taking better initiatives on aid packages?

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the point made by my hon. Friend about the widespread use of soft credit by our competitors. My hon. Friend will also have noted that the Department of Trade and Industry is top for questions on Wednesday 23 October.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Is the Leader of the House aware that the prison population is now at its highest and that the cost of keeping people in prison is well over £200 a week? Against that background, when will the House have an opportunity to discuss conditions within our prisons? It is a long time since we had such a debate.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a valid point of general public concern. He will be aware that the Home Office is top for questions in the week that we return after the recess. In the meantime, I shall refer his point to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Two weeks ago, I invited my right hon. Friend to ask the Home Secretary whether he would make a statement to the House on possible legislation in the next Session of Parliament to withdraw from drug traffickers their ill-gotten gains? As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has not felt able to make such a statement, does my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House know whether any legislation on this subject will be introduced in the next Session of Parliament?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a very important point which will command assent in all parts of the House. He will appreciate that I cannot anticipate what will be contained in the Queen's Speech. I hope that my hon. Friend will not be too pessimistic.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Has the Leader of the House considered whether he can find time to debate the collapse of Kestrel Communications Ltd. and its implications, as recently reported on the BBC's "Watchdog" programme? Does he agree that it is extraordinary that pensions broker can, by devising a scheme to employ people for one day, unlock people's frozen pensions at the same time as conning major pensions funds, the Inland Revenue, the Occupational Pensions Board and the Manpower Services Commission into approving the scheme to the extent that 270 people lost most of their life savings? Should there not be a more effective watchdog with effective teeth in some of the bodies available to protect people against such abuses?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I do not comment upon the details of that instance. No Government time has been made available for such a debate in the first week when we return after the recess. I wish the hon. Gentleman every success in whatever initiatives he may try to undertake on his own account.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In view of the fact that the cost of running the House has escalated from £56·2 million in 1981-82 to £77·5 million in 1984-85, what proposals will my right hon. Friend introduce in the next Session to trim the appalling costs, bearing in mind that it is suggested that our debates will be broadcast into our own offices and that Parliament will be televised? That will cost a lot of additional money for something which most people do not want. Can my right hon. Friend give us some ideas?

Mr. Biffen: I must say that over the last 48 hours I have had some dark thoughts about weed killer, but I require notice of such a question so that I can give a proper and measured reply.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to read Amnesty International's latest report on Turkey? The report states that torture of political detainees in Turkey remains widespread and systematical. Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in condemning torture in Turkey? Will he oppose any integration of Turkey into the EEC and other European Community institutions? Will he arrange for an early statement to be made on the Government's policy and attitude towards Turkey?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of what the hon. Gentleman says. I will draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Between now and when we return in October, it is likely that a decision will be taken on the European fighter aircraft. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that we shall have the opportunity to debate that matter as soon as we return? In the meantime, can he assure all hon. Members that he will represent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence the grave anxiety felt by hon. Members that a compromise might be reached that will produce an aeroplane that does not meet the requirements of the Royal Air Force?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot anticipate when a decision will be reached on the project, but I recognise that it is of great interest to hon. Members and, indeed, to the country generally. I shall be in close touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence about how the matter should be handled.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of the report published today about the formidable housing crisis in the country, will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind the need for an early debate on housing? With regard to the remarks made by the Prime Minister, is the Leader of the House aware that since 1979 there has been a cut in real terms of 68 per cent. in public expenditure on housing? Does not that explain the sort of conditions in which so many people are forced to live because they have no means of obtaining adequate rented accommodation?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman has chosen a statistic that is only one component of the housing situation.

Mr. Winnick: A true one.

Mr. Biffen: That may be so, but it may not truly reflect the full range of housing expenditure. We should be delighted to debate the housing record of the Government. There will soon be a Gracious Speech and the debates that follow will provide an early opportunity to discuss housing.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): If a week is a long time in politics, surely three months is an age in the affairs of the European Community. Will my right hon. Friend explain to those of us who are less knowledgeable about procedures in the House precisely how long we shall have after the House resumes to table amendments to the European Communities (Finance) Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I shall be happy to contact my hon. Friend to give him the most accurate answer that I can, based on the most qualified advice. I am sure that my hon. Friend will spend most of the holiday, after its initial joy has worn off, by returning to his first love of Brussels bashing. I cannot believe that he will come back without a fistful of amendments.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the Leader of the House recollect that one of the most considerable of his predecessors, the late Mr. Iain Macleod, used the phrase "parliamentary sleight of hand"? Did not the Prime Minister's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) come into that category? Although there was a debate on 18 February, many of us were asked, rightly, not to vote until our parliamentary colleagues had reached an informed decision. That has now happened, so is it not important that the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), for example, should give his view of events?

When was the last time that four Members of the House of Commons, using their own resources and without the help of Clerks of the House, produced a massive and serious report? This is a House of Commons rather than a party political matter. It is important that a minority report that has been produced in such a way for the first time should be seriously debated. It is not sufficient to say, in answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), "I will consult the Foreign Secretary." Ought not there to be a debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I say at once that the hon. Gentleman has a well-documented commitment and enthusiasm for the subject, but he must not suppose that it is rare to have a minority report on a Select Committee recommendation, because it has happened frequently in the past. However, I agree that it is a matter of continuing parliamentary interest, and I shall take account of the hon. Gentleman's remarks when considering how the matter should be handled in the future.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to early-day motion 796 which is in my name and that of 151 right hon. and hon. Members.

[That this House calls upon the Government to re-affirm its commitment to conservation of the environment and open space and to the sanctity of national parks as enshrined in Department of the Environment Circular 4 of 1976 that no new route for long distance traffic should be constructed through a national park, or existing road upgraded, unless it has been demonstrated there is a compelling need which could not be met by any reasonable alternative means; and applauds the decision of the Joint Select Committee of Peers and honourable Members which refused to permit the violation of the Dartmoor

National Park by the building of a dual-carriageway through the open spaces of Bluebell Woods and East Hill, and which affirmed that a northern route outside the Dartmoor National Park offered a reasonable alternative means of bypassing Okehampton.]

Will my hon. Friend explain to the House why at 11 o'clock this morning there appeared on the television screens notification to the effect that a statement would be made this afternoon, presumably by the Secretary of State for the Environment, about whether the Okehampton bypass should go south or north and then at 1 o'clock that notification disappeared from the screen? Will my right hon. Friend explain why that happened and when a statement will be made, bearing in mind that the southern route can be built by 1998 and the northern route by 1990 if he got on with it?

Mr. Biffen: It is the first I have heard about a statement on the screen at 11 o'clock this morning. I will look into the matter.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): When the House returns towards the end of October, could the Leader of the House arrange for a debate on law and order? We could then compare the 10,000 arrests and 600 sackings of miners during 1984-85 with the 9,000 employers in 1984 who were guilty of illegally under-paying workers—particularly young workers—of whom two were prosecuted and average fines imposed were £107. Would not that debate reveal the hyprocrisy of his so-called party of law and order?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot undertake that there will be such a debate in the first week after the recess. However, I am certain that that topic will feature in the political controversies that will follow the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on arranging a debate on clean, renewable alternative energy sources—the first for many a long day in this House—and say how much some of us appreciate the interest shown in the less popular sources of entertainment in this place?

Mr. Biffen: Thank you very much.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I wonder whether the Leader of the House can tell us today whether he expects to have the same job when we come back on 21 October? Can he give us——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman asking for a debate on that? We are concerned here with the business of the House.

Mr. Skinner: I wonder whether the Leader of the House can make a short statement to give us an idea of whether he will be coming back to the House in the same job, or whether the changes will apply only to some of his mates?

Mr. Biffen: I have given no thought to that, but now that the matter has been raised I shall consult the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo).

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Is my right hon. Friend aware that set down on the Order Paper for Friday 25 October is the Second Reading of the Prevention of Political Corruption Bill which I was given leave to introduce on Tuesday? Does my right hon. Friend think that that is surprising, and does he think that the House will have time to debate the fact that no fewer than 129 hon. Members of the parliamentary Labour party and two hon. Members of the parliamentary Liberal party voted against this worthy and sensible measure and therefore, presumably, showed themselves to be in favour of such politically corrupt acts as the GLC giving £1·5 million for anti-police work? If my right hon. Friend cannot ensure a Second Reading on 25 October, will he ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to put such a measure in the Queen's Speech?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly cannot give the guarantee and undertaking that is sought and I think that it would be presumptuous of me to turn to my right hon. Friend and ask him. However, my hon. Friend is doing a signal public duty in giving the maximum publicity that he has to that issue.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): The House recently had the opportunity to discuss the nurses' pay award, but is the Leader of the House aware that in the last 10 days a new injustice has emerged which has been met with a wave of indignation throughout the profession? Will he arrange for the Secretary of State for Social Services to make a statement after the recess on the pension problem of a ward sister who was awarded 14 per cent. by the review body and for 1985-86 will receive only 5·6 per cent.? In consequence, when she retires in the next 18 months she will lose £6,000 of pension.

Mr. Biffen: It is the first time that I have heard of this case, and I will certainly draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services so that he may consider the appropriate action to take.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has gained enormous media coverage through the publication of the Common Ownership of Land Bill? Is he aware that the Public Bill Office has no knowledge of that publication? So that we may know his proposals which cause concern and consternation to my constituents and to many others throughout the country, no doubt, and so that we may know the Opposition's position, will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: No. We must keep all these matters in very strict perspective. What has happened just shows that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) is adept at dropping bricks without straw.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Would the Leader of the House consider making a statement in the week after the summer recess about the issue of reports and written answers, whether or not they are embargoed, to members of the press and the rest of the media before they are made available to Members of the House? The Leader of the House surely recognises that it is wrong for hon. Members to be asked for views on a report which they are unable to secure? Surely the convenience of Members of the House is more important than the convenience of the media?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman touches on a point which has exercised the House for decades. If he has evidence to put to me, I shall see what can be done.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to see the all-party early-day motion

[Mr. Keith Best]

816 standing in my name and that of 50 other hon. Members calling for an early debate on the strategic defence initiative?

[That this House notes the visit of Vice President Bush to Europe to urge European participation in the Strategic Defence Initiative programme; expresses deep concern that there has not been a full debate on the subject in the House; notes that the Strategic Defence Inititative calls into question the current philosophy of deterrence on which North Atlantic Treaty Organisation policy is based; and calls for such a debate in the House as a matter of urgency, since a debate has been held in all other European Parliaments.]

Bearing in mind that similar debates have taken place in other European Parliaments, and bearing in mind the implications for the whole concept of NATO's deterrent policy as well as the importance to British industry, will he ensure that we have a debate at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Biffen: That the topic is important is self-evident, but in the first week after the recess no Government time will be available for such a debate. However, the hon. Gentleman might like to make some of his points at Question Time on Tuesday of the first week when defence is top of the list.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Leader of the House believe that a debate is urgently needed on the behaviour of British companies and British investors in South Africa, particularly in view of the behaviour of SARMCOL, a subsidiary of the British Tyre and Rubber Company, which for 13 years has refused to recognise the Metal and Allied Workers Union in South Africa?

It is reported that the company pays poverty wages and that there has been a strike there for over three months by 1,000 workers demanding trade union recognition. Does he not agree that the company's behaviour is unfortunately typical of the behaviour of many foreign companies which invest in South Africa, and is yet another reason for having a policy of disinvestment in South Africa?

Mr. Biffen: No provision has been made for a debate on South Africa in the first week after the recess, but there are foreboding signs that that country's problems will intensify rather than ease, and I have an uneasy feeling that it will feature very much in our political discussions as the autumn progresses.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): Before the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) rose in his place to accuse my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of a parliamentary sleight of hand in her reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), I had sought your permission, Mr. Speaker, to raise a point of order in relation to the question put by the hon. Member for Newham, South.

I think that the accusation of parliamentary sleight of hand might more appropriately be put to the hon. Member for Newham, South. He and many of his hon. Friends are trying to perpetrate the myth that there was something ungenuine about my visit to Washington and New York on 1 and 2 May 1982. I have given the full story to the Select Committee, which knows all the details. I have described exactly what happened during my visit. What does not seem to be understood, and has not been fully brought out in the Select Committee's conclusions, I think, is that the Peruvian plans which were in a very early, tentative stage on 2 May were developed in the succeeding four or five days after the Belgrano was sunk. I made a statement about those proposals in the House on Friday—I speak from memory—7 May 1982.

When those proposals were turned down by Argentina, it was not the end of our search for a peaceful solution. It was my responsibility at that time, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, to leave no stone unturned to find a peaceful way in which to resolve the dispute. I remind the House that after the second set of proposals was turned down we drafted a peace initiative to which we would have been prepared to agree. We put that before the United Nations on 17 May. This country and the world were surprised to discover the lengths to which we were prepared to go to reach a peaceful settlement. Many Opposition Members try to allege that our search for a peaceful settlement was not genuine. That is an absolute lie, and it ought to be laid.

Mr. Dalyell: I am not arguing the case but the right hon. Gentleman's remarks proves the need for a debate. The former Foreign Secretary has referred to proposals. Yet the Prime Minister said that no news of the proposals had reached London until three hours after the Belgrano had been sunk. In answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), the right hon. Lady said that the first indications of the Peruvian peace proposals had reached London at 11.15 pm on Sunday 2 May. Right or wrong, that is not the former Foreign Secretary's story.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is going beyond business questions. If this is a matter which may be debated at another time, that is the time at which the hon. Gentleman should make his remarks.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is just over a year since legislation was passed creating the six free trading zones, sometimes called free ports, but that little or no progress has been made? Does he agree, therefore, that it would be appropriate to have a debate on the progress of the legislation as soon as we return after the recess?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend made a contribution of considerable force and persuasiveness in the recess Adjournment debate last night. Will not that coast him through until the Queen's Speech?

Mr. Steen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am told that at about 11 o'clock this morning members of the Press Gallery were told that the Secretary of State for the Environment would make a statement on the Okehampton bypass this afternoon. At 12.45 Downing street indicated that no statement would be made. Can you, Mr. Speaker, tell us whether there will be a statement, or how that arrangement came about?

Mr. Speaker: I have no idea. All I know is that there is to be no statement today.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During business questions the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) raised a matter concerning my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I have been in the House for a long time. When I first came here it was a matter of courtesy for hon. Members, irrespective of their party, who wished to raise a matter affecting another hon. Member to notify him. I regarded that as civilised behaviour.

Am I to understand that with the arrival of new Members, especially over the past few years, that civilised behaviour has come to an end? I know that the matter does not fall within your prerogative, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps you could ask Members to behave in a civilised way and to adopt the procedure that was used when I first came to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I am glad of the opportunity to confirm that that has been our civilised convention over the years, and I hope that it will continue.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I understand——

Mr. Heddle rose——

Mr. Skinner: He wants to apologise.

Mr. Dobson: They never apologise.

Mr. Heddle: I fully intended to notify the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) but on this occasion I did not. I apologise wholeheartedly to the House for not doing so. I want to make two points——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That might spoil it.

Mr. Dobson: I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible under the rules of the House for a Minister to make a statement tomorrow in the midst of the Adjournment debates? I understand that the Secretary of State for the Environment intends to make a statement now about the level of the rate support grant and rate capping of local authorities but that no statement is to be made about the rate capping and expenditure of the Inner London education authority. As it affects tens of thousands of children, and as it is the largest and biggest spending authority, it seems appropriate that a Minister should come to the House to justify the levels being set.

Mr. Nellist: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that the Royal Assent has been given to the Local Government Bill which sets up new means of controlling services in the GLC and the metropolitan areas. Will a further statement be made today or tomorrow on the setting of budgets and expenditure levels for services such as transport and waste disposal, or will that be done during the recess when Labour Members cannot question it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member knows perfectly well that I have no foreknowledge of such matters, any more than any other hon. Member. Statements are announced at noon. That was when I first heard about it.

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not a matter for me; it is a matter for the Government. If it is a matter for me, I will hear it, but only if it is a matter for me.

Mr. Dobson: I think that it is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker.

I was asking whether it was possible under the rules of order for a statement to be made tomorrow in the midst of the Adjournment debates. I do not know the answer to that question, but I do not think that it is a matter for Ministers.

Mr. Speaker: It might have been more appropriate if the hon. Gentleman had put that question to the Leader of the House during business questions.

Rate Support Grant (England)

4.8 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about local government finance for 1986-87. It contains my proposals for the rate support grant settlement for England, and my decisions on selective rate limitation.

First, I deal with rate limitation. This year's round has gone well. It has saved ratepayers over £300 million. We have begun to curb the worst overspending of the most profligate authorities. Despite the disgraceful scenes of violence and intimidation in several town halls, there were majorities in every rate-capped council for complying with the law and the will of this House.

I am today laying before the House a report setting out how authorities will be selected for rate limitation next year. For authorities not previously selected, I am proposing the same criteria as I used this year: I am selecting authorities whose budgets this year are more than 20 per cent. above grant-related expenditure and more than 4 per cent. above target. For authorities which were selected this year, I am reselecting them if their budgeted expenditure is more than 20 per cent. above GRE and either more than 1 per cent. above target or more than 30 per cent. over their expenditure in 1981-82.

On these criteria, two authorities, Liverpool and Newcastle, are selected for the first time, and 10 authorities are reselected. They are Basildon, Camden, Greenwich, Hackney, Haringey, Islington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Southwark and Thamesdown. Next year new authorities will come into existence under the Local Government Act 1985 and will be affected by the automatic precept control provided by that Act. Under that provision the Government will set expenditure levels and precept limits for three years. In all, the Government will next year be limiting the rates or precepts of 32 authorities with expenditure totalling some £3·5 billion. That demonstrates the Government's continued determination to rein back the profligacy of the largest overspenders and to prevent extravagance in the initial years of the new authorities.

I am setting expenditure levels for the 12 rate-capped authorities. In most cases there will again be a cash standstill on budgeted total expenditure in the current year. In three cases where budgets this year show an exceptionally sharp increase in spending, I am setting lower spending levels.

I am open to representations for redetermination of expenditure levels. Where an existing authority applies mainly because it considers we have made inadequate allowance for functions inherited from the GLC and metropolitan counties, or mainly because special accounting arrangements in its view imply unachievable economies, I shall not use my powers to reduce expenditure levels or impose conditions. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education, the Home Department and Transport will be making separate announcements about expenditure levels for ILEA and the new joint authorities.

The success of rate capping in curbing the worst excesses of the highest spenders means that for the generality of authorities we can now do without targets and penalties next year. That brings me to the rate support grant settlement as a whole. I am today issuing to local authorities proposals for the main features of the settlement for next year. Copies are in the Library and the Vote Office.

The target system has operated since 1981-82 in order to put pressure on councils to restrain spending. Many of my hon. and right hon. Friends have in the past made the point that the system operates unfairly on low-spending councils, especially those spending below their GRE. Last January in the RSG debate I expressed the hope that for 1986-87 we could do without targets if there was a satisfactory alternative means of restraining spending. I believe that the block grant system can be modified to provide a sufficient deterrent to overspending and accordingly I can tell the House today that the system of targets and penalties will not apply next year.

Instead, expenditure restraint will be achieved by much stronger block grant pressures. I am proposing sharply to increase the rate at which a council's grant will be reduced as its spending rises in relation to GRE. The system will thus put more weight on the comparison of a council's spending with its GRE which is what my right hon. and hon. Friends have sought. Powerful pressures will remain on those councils which spend well above GRE. I am consulting local government on the details.

I am proposing that aggregate Exchequer grant should be the same cash sum as in this year's settlement, £11·8 billion, which is likely to be just under 47 per cent. of relevant expenditure next year. I am proposing to increase the sum provided for local authority current expenditure for 1986-87, as shown in this year's public expenditure White Paper, by £500 million, to £22·250 billion. That is less than local authorities would like but the Audit Commission's reports are showing how councils could save hundreds of millions of pounds without reducing services, simply by getting better value for money.

The RSG settlement that I am proposing will be less complex than in past years; it will be fairer to responsible, low-spending authorities; it will maintain pressure on higher-spending authorities to find savings; and it will place firm control on the most extravagant authorities. If local government responds sensibly, average rate increases next year should be in low single figures.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Is the Secretary of State aware—clearly some of his hon. Friends are not—that he has just announced a massive increase in authoritarian central control of local authority expenditure and budgets? He has done so on two counts: first, on the implications of his statements on the Rates Act and, secondly, on his proposals for the rate support grant settlement. Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that the reality of his statement is that more than 20 million people, under more than 30 authorities, will now have the level of their services and the budgets of their authorities dictated and controlled from Whitehall? That is what the Secretary of State has been telling the House this afternoon.

Why do his right hon. Friends who are responsible for the Inner London education authority, the police service, the fire service and transport, apparently intend to slip out in written answers, either today or tomorrow, their decisions on budgets for those authorities, instead of telling the House of Commons in this or other statements this afternoon? It is a scandalous abuse of Parliament.

Why do transport authorities such as South Yorkshire have to wait to be told by how much the Government intend to force up fares for public transport users in those areas?

Will the Secretary of State explain why the city of Newcastle upon Tyne is to be designated under the Rates Act? That city's expenditure has increased by 91·5 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79. For example, expenditure in Buckinghamshire in the same period increased by more than 112 per cent., in Somerset by more than 103 per cent., in West Sussex by 99 per cent., and in Cornwall by 98 per cent. Is the Secretary of State aware that the net expenditure of the city of Newcastle upon Tyne has fallen in real terms over that period? Is the Secretary of State also aware that if the penalty system that he imposed had not applied there would have been no need for rates increases in that city in the current financial year?

Why should the Secretary of State and his hon. Friends take any pride in increasing the problems facing the people of Liverpool and its city council by further designating that authority under the Rates Act?

The Secretary of State said that he wanted to encourage negotiations in the coming financial year. I welcome at least that part of his statement. So will he give a categorical assurance now, without equivocation, that if authorities approach him on that basis he will not use his severe reserve powers to make the situation worse for them?

On the rate support grant settlement, is the Secretary of State aware that this is the sixth successive year in which the Government have deliberately reduced the rate support grant—in this case, from 48·7 per cent. to just under 47 per cent. of local authority current expenditure? The figure of £11·8 billion that he announced will be a cut in real terms of 7 per cent., bearing in mind the current rate of inflation, because it is a cash freeze. Hon. Gentlemen need not shake their heads. That is the reality of the announcement.

Is the Secretary of State aware that there will be a shortfall in what councils — including Conservative councils — need to maintain their existing services, of almost £1 billion next year, as a result of this statement?

As Conservative Members appear to be welcoming this statement—based on the use of the GRE in a way that was never intended — will the right hon. Gentleman explain to them what will happen in the Tory borough of Brent, with an expenditure of 18·3 per cent. over GRE? What is to happen in the City of London, with a staggering excess of expenditure over GRE of 252 per cent.? What is to happen in Hammersmith and Fulham, where expenditure over GRE is more than 12 per cent., or Hillingdon, where it is more than 9 per cent., or Harrow or Enfield or Havering or Bexley or even — dare I remind the right hon. Gentleman? — Barnet, where expenditure is also in excess of GRE? What about Conservative Harrogate, Conservative Dartford, Conservative Adur or Conservative Ribble Valley or Hertsmere? The list goes on and on. Having engineered a debacle for the Conservative party in the shire counties this year, the right hon. Gentleman is about to do the same for the district authorities. Or does he, through some political fix or manipulation of figures, intend to bail out the outer London Tory boroughs and others in a political gerrymander?

Is the Secretary of State aware that the £1 billion gap will inevitably increase if a settlement of the teachers dispute exceeds the 5 per cent. budgeted for, as is inevitable if there is to be a settlement? What impact does the right hon. Gentleman expect that to have on his proposals?

In using GRE in this way, the right hon. Gentleman again casts aside promises made to the House by his predecessors about its use. I refer principally to pledges given to the House by the previous Secretary of State for the Environment, now Secretary of State for Employment. He said of GREAs:

"It is not suggested that it prescribes a specific level to which an authority ought to spend . . . I want to make it clear that that was not the purpose."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 1 April 1980, c. 941.]

The Secretary of State is totally casting that promise aside. He knows that the Audit Commission and all local authority associations reject this approach to local authority expenditure.

Finally, what now of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's claims that the Government want to increase expenditure on local authority services, as the only way that that can be done is by all authorities—Tory as well as Labour—spending in excess of their GREA?

Mr. Jenkin: I can well understand the wish of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to redeem himself. His questions were certainly numerous and long.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary have today answered written questions setting out the expenditure levels for ILEA and the police and fire authorities. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has said that he does not yet have the information to enable him to set the expenditure levels for the transport joint boards and that he will make anouncements later.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that my statement constitutes an increase in authoritarian control. He is absolutely wrong. The abolition of targets means that we can leave local authorities a greater measure of control over their spending than has existed in the past three or four years.

He asked why we had selected Newcastle for rate capping. Newscastle is overspending its target this year by 7 per cent. and overspending its GRE by 31 per cent. It therefore qualifies under the criteria that I announced. Newcastle's rate is one of the highest in the country—70 per cent. over the past average. It employs one third more staff per thousand than the average of metropolitan districts, and its rates have risen by 66 per cent. in the past four years, compared with the rise in general price index of 23 per cent. I have no doubt that most of the ratepayers in Newcastle will be delighted that I have capped the authority.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Liverpool. He will be as aware as I am of the refusal of Liverpool city council this year to strike a budget in line with the rate that it has voted. No doubt it has that matter under consideration. It is quite clear that, on the budget that it has published, it is well above the target limit that we have set and well above the GRE and therefore qualifies for ratecapping next year. I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman said about my assurances about redetermination and I stand by the words of my statement. Doubtless he will wish to read it carefully. In those terms they were unqualified.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that there was a £1 billion shortfall to maintain services. He takes the figure which the local authorities identified in the expenditure groups of the consultative council. We have increased the amount to be provided in the public expenditure White Paper by £0·5 billion. That represents a significant move towards what the local authorities are requesting, but it would be foolish for the Government to fail to indicate to local authorities that this rate support grant settlement is intended to sustain the pressure for economies and savings.

The hon. Gentleman asked about what would happen, if a teachers' settlement were made, if the teachers' unions and the employers were to agree by October, in the terms of my right hon. Friend's statement, a settlement that would raise the level above that accounted for in this settlement. There would obviously be time to make the necessary adjustments in the final rate support grant settlement for next year.

The hon. Gentleman asked about GREs and quoted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. GREs are not targets. They are not prescriptive and in no sense do we regard them as a substitute or surrogate for targets. That has always been the case. There will be no holdback of grant to the Treasury next year for overspending GRE. We are proposing to use the GRE and the block grant mechanisms to a greater extent than before to exert pressure on high-spending authorities to find savings. We have no intention of forcing authorities to spend at the GRE level. They can spend at other levels. It is up to them and what they can justify to their ratepayers. As for the string of local authorities which the hon. Gentleman mentioned in the course of his question, I can only imagine that he was recounting his journey on Tuesday night. Individual authorities will need to study the consultative document to see how the settlement applies to them.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): My right hon. Friend will know with what relief his announcement today of the abandonment of targets and penalties for the generality of authorities will be greeted. Hon. Members who have been campaigning for that will wish to thank him for that, and no one more than I. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, when my right hon. Friend makes another benevolent announcement, I hope that he can do so before the local elections rather than after. I should like to put two questions to him. First, will he assure me that he will not invent any device remotely comparable to targets and penalties and that the low-spending authorities can in future receive that fair treatment to which he referred in his statement? Secondly, in considering local government financial reform and local government generally in future, will he reject the false notion that Whitehall knows best and give local electorates the greatest degree of local responsibility and accountability possible?

Mr. Jenkin: I thank my right hon. Friend for his remarks. I can certainly give him the assurance that low-spending authorities, spending below or close to GRE will, on average, stand to gain grant, but of course will continue to face grant pressures against increased spending. On his second point, those two propositions of greater accountability and greater responsibility are the two principles which underpin the local government finance studies on which my hon. Friends are currently engaged.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he is being wholly illogical today? Is he aware that, although he says that he is abolishing penalties, he is reintroducing them by another name? The right hon. Gentleman is suggesting that, with all its problems, Liverpool city council is profligate, yet he went to Liverpool and was shocked at the housing conditions and recognised the terrible housing problems and high levels of unemployment. Is what the Government are doing to Liverpool under the right hon. Gentleman's announcement this afternoon not sheer vindictiveness? If the right hon. Gentleman is serious about negotiations, he should for God's sake open discussions with the councillors to try to reach a sensible settlement instead of pushing them over the brink so that there will be a glorious smash-up for which the right hon. Gentleman, if he continues, will be responsible.

Mr. Jenkin: I utterly refute the hon. Gentleman's allegations. There is no vindictiveness. The council has made its rate and budget decisions this year in full knowledge of the conditions voted and approved by the House as long ago as last January. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Liverpool city council is perfectly capable of managing its affairs if it chooses to do so. I fear that a number of its councillors do not seriously wish to live within the rules that apply to everyone else, but no doubt there is still time.

On Liverpool's housing, the city has 8 per cent. arrears on council house rent income and 10 per cent. of its total housing stock is lying empty. Liverpool is perfectly capable of finding economies in managing its service and it is time that it started to do so.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on making the block grant system less incomprehensible and for responding so warmly to requests from local authorities and from so many of his right hon. and hon. Friends to abolish targets and penalties. However, will the new arrangements allow low-spending counties complete discretion to spend up to GRE without running into block grant pressures? Will my right hon. Friend also take account of the fact that the savings suggested by the Audit Commissioner, to which he rightly referred, cannot be made equally by all local authorities? Some are more efficient than others and so have not the same scope for savings.

Mr. Jenkin: I entirely accept my hon. Friend's last point.

The revised block grant schedules are spelled out in the consultation document and the House will wish to study the details. Low-spending authorities will start with a higher entitlement to grant than hitherto but the steeper slopes of the block grant schedules will mean that authorities will face grant pressures against increased spending, albeit with greater flexibility than under targets and holdback. Correspondingly, high-spending authorities can achieve considerable savings for their ratepayers if they restrain the growth of their spending and begin to cut back. In that way the block grant system will achieve what was intended when it was introduced in 1980.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Will the Secretary of State accept that if GRE is to be used to control local authority spending it must reflect much more accurately than it does today the social problems of the inner cities? How does the Secretary of State expect local authorities to plan sensibly when every year they have to face a major upheaval in the administration of the block grant system? How does the Secretary of State equate the centralised control of 32 authorities' expenditure with the principles of local government?

Mr. Jenkin: The GREs have been in existence for five years and have been subject to repeated refinement in a process that is carried out jointly by local authority associations in the grants working group of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance. There is always room for further refinements and improvements, but they are achieved year by year.

Between now and the final announcement of the rate support grant settlement, which I hope will be in December, we shall continue that process so that the GREs can increasingly reflect the reality of local authorities' spending needs.

We are not making this an alternative to targets. The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) will see that the revised block grant schedules—the slopes that will result in the reduction of grant as spending rises—do not hinge on the GRE. There is a margin 5 per cent. above and 10 per cent. above, so there is scope for flexibility. I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making, but these are matters which can be discussed with the local authority associations.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Despite the attacks which have been made on him over the past 18 months or so, my right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on his tough and resolute approach towards the whole vexed question of rates. Will he reiterate the fact that only a minority of individuals in this country pay direct rates? Is he aware that two or three days ago I learned quite unexpectedly that I, as a humble ratepayer in Lambeth, should be paying about £30 a year less than previously, and that—far more important—many hundreds of other people will be paying far less? In those circumstances, my right hon. Friend must be justified in his actions.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's words. It is the limited number of those who pay rates which has given rise to the mismatch between those who vote and those who receive services. That, too, is one of the issues at the heart of the local government finance studies in which my hon. Friends are engaged.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that he makes Tammany hall politicians look like amateurs? Is it not monstrous that he should make this rate-capping statement today without giving hon. Members from Newcastle upon Tyne, which it affects, any details or any opportunity to go into the Library to look up the details and then savage him as we would have a right to do? Is it fair for the right hon. Gentleman to prattle on about rate increases of 91 per cent. in Newcastle upon Tyne since 1978-79, when he knows well enough that the reason for 91 per cent. rate increases is the savage reduction in the rate support grant that he has inflicted on Newcastle upon Tyne and on every other major city?

The Secretary of State went on to berate Newcastle for being 7 per cent. above target, spending 31 per cent. more than the GRE. He knows quite well that the GRE for Newcastle is much less than the target. This year, Newcastle city council has very responsibly set a standstill budget of £146 million. The right hon. Gentleman said nothing about the price that will have to be paid for the abolition of Tyne and Wear county council, although I concede that he said he was prepared to have discussions. That should have been in his statement, and we should have been allowed time to consider it and debate the issue.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman may have lost sight of the fact that this is a provisional announcement, in accordance with the pattern followed by Governments in recent years. The final rate support grant settlement will be announced in December and will be debated soon after Christmas. I can promise the hon. Gentleman — no, perhaps I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman. He will have plenty of opportunities to savage whoever will be standing at this Dispatch Box then.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The right hon. Gentleman is to be reshuffled.

Mr. John Cunningham: It will be the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's assurance. However, I must point out that Newcastle has been a high-spending authority for years. Its rate has been one of the highest, if not the highest, in the country. Its expenditure per head last year was nearly a quarter as high again as the average for metropolitan district councils. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) will be well aware of the outcry which greeted this year's rate increase, which I believe was about 23 per cent. I think that there would have been great disappointment in Newcastle if I had not included its name among those to be rate-capped next year.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that through his statement, far from reducing penalties and lifting the burden from local authorities, he is ensuring that a local authority does not have to reach a target to be penalised but must merely exceed its GRE?

Does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that his remarks today — during what is, apparently, his swansong—on the subject of Liverpool will be regarded there as a gross betrayal of the citizens of that city after the visits paid to it last year by him and his hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction? On that visit, he promised to devote his best endeavours to assisting the city with its serious housing problems. The only way in which he can now show that he is not being vindictive is by agreeing to meet the democratically elected councillors of Liverpool.

Mr. Jenkin: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the chief executive of the city council recently wrote to my Department setting out two or three matters about which he thought it would be useful to have a meeting.

As I explained to the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends when they met me to discuss the matter, in view of the situation in Liverpool there seems to be no purpose in our meeting now to discuss those matters.

The trouble with Liverpool city council is that its demands are always so extravagant and unreasonable that any discussion of them is bound to end in tears. There is, therefore, no purpose in embarking on that course.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): I join many of my right hon. and hon. Friends in saying how pleased my authority of Sefton will be with the Secretary of State's announcement that targets and penalties are to be abandoned.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunninghan) said about him adding to the problems of Liverpool, since he took office in Marsham street in 1983 he has devoted more of his time and made more offers of co-operation to Liverpool council in an attempt to sort out its problems than to any other council in the country?

Will he also agree that the refusal over many months of the leaders of Liverpool city council to co-operate with his Department is a major contributing factor in the problems that Liverpool faces in determining its rate and budget?

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with every word of what my hon. Friend said. I add only that last year, at the end of lengthy discussions with Liverpool, we agreed to an addition to its urban programme of £2·5 million if it could identify suitable projects. Now, over a year later, the council has put forward projects amounting to only £1·7 million; and as I told the hon. Members for Liverpool constituencies who came to see me, the balance remains on offer and the undertaking that I gave will be honoured. If the council wants the benefits of that money, it should put in the necessary applications.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I warmly welcome the fact that he has at last recognised the unfair way in which the target system bore upon responsible authorities such as Cambridgeshire?

To clarify the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), will my right hon. Friend confirm that if, in future, the authorities in Cambridgeshire pursue the same financial disciplines and prudent policies of their predecessors, the ratepayers will benefit from his announcement today?

Mr. Jenkin: That is quite right. Conversely, if those authorities now choose to raise their spending sharply they will find that that will impose considerable penalties on their ratepayers.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Secretary of State accept——

Mr. Jenkin: If I may correct myself, I did not mean penalties in the sense of the targets, but that the ratepayers will find themselves paying higher rates.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State accept that, while we welcome the abolition of part of the monopoly of control exercised through the target and penalties system, we do not believe that people will be deluded into thinking that the settlement as a whole is advantageous?

First, the Secretary of State should tell the House that there will be a cut in central Government money for local authority services, as that is what his announcement implies. Secondly, it would be helpful if he would state the three local authorities that will have lower spending limits, which he mentioned in his statement.

The right hon. Gentleman may not want to be wise after the event, which is the lot of all his right hon. and hon. Friends who pleaded with him to benefit the shires. On behalf of all the alliance authorities which now control those shires, I am happy to accept that benefit. However, does he now need to be wise before the event in the context of the inner city? What is apparent is that the inner city authorities, with the transitional scheme, are likely to be particularly hard hit in future. There will have to be changes if they are not to be penalised unnecessarily—Tory, Labour or alliance—in the coming year, and if the system is to be fair where the needs are clearly still greatest.

Mr. Jenkin: I should like to compare the Exchequer grant figure in my statement with what will now be paid to local authorities following the first interim supplementary report for this year. There is an increase in the percentage next year. The withholding through the penalty system of over £500 million of grant under the target and penalty system has reduced this figure to below 47 per cent. this year, and it will be above that next year. Because there will be no holdback of penalty that will go to the Treasury, any grant which is withdrawn from an authority which increases expenditure will be redistributed among the remainder of authorities, and particularly benefit low-spending authorities who have budgeted responsibly.

On the question of the consequences of abolition, I assure the hon. Gentleman that they have been taken into account in setting the expenditure levels of successor authorities which are rate-capped.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State said that there would be a debate later. I appeal to hon. Members to ask briefer questions and not to give a forecast of the speech that they may make later.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge the history of financial rectitude by the county of Dorset over the past few years in contrast to other authorities, not all of them Opposition-controlled? May we look forward to an appropriate reward in years to come?

Mr. Jenkin: Dorset will find that it has its rewards in this rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Brent is very temporarily Conservative-controlled. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it will not be rate-capped next year? His statement means that he—if he is still there—will have the same controls as he has at the moment. Has he had the opportunity of discussing with his hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction the three-hour visit, for which I was most grateful, that he made to look at the squalid plight of 1,100 homeless families in sleazy hotels? The several clergymen present made some suggestions to which his hon. Friend listened with great courtesy. Does this statement mean that there will be no hope for the homeless families in Brent?

Mr. Jenkin: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, Brent is not being selected for next year because, as a result of the selection and rate capping this year, it has succeeded in restraining its expenditure to the point where it is below the criterion of 20 per cent. above GRE. It has therefore properly—I am glad of this—removed itself from rate capping.

I should like to discuss with my hon. Friend the Member for Housing and Construction what the hon. Gentleman said in the second part of his question.

Mr. Wilkinson: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. The target and penalty system which my hon. Friends the Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and I campaigned so vigorously against is to be withdrawn. Will he reassure us that our borough of Hillingdon, which had the highest percentage increase in rates in London, and was not rate-capped, will be compensated in full by central Government for those extra functions which it will have to inherit following the abolition of the GLC?

Mr. Jenkin: I understand the anxieties that many successful authorities are feeling as these matters have not been finalised. The intention is that the GREs of the abolished authorities should be distributed among the successor authorities, so that they have an adequate base from which to supply the appropriate level of services. It will be up to the successor authorities—such as my hon. Friend's London borough of Hillingdon—to decide how many extra staff, and so on, they will need to fulfil those functions. I have been greatly reassured by the number of authorities which believe that they can take on the GLC's functions in transport and planning and so on, with very few additional staff. That will redound to the benefit of their ratepayers.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): How can the Secretary of State justify what will amount to harsh and cruel cuts in the services for and living standards of the poorest people in the poorest borough in the country, Hackney, when across the road in the City of London rich, powerful and fraudulent people at a bank are being bailed out with public money to the tune of £248 million? Is there one law for the rich and one for the poor?

Mr. Jenkin: Hackney's rates, despite rate capping this year, are 124 per cent. above the average for inner London authorities. If the hon. Gentleman cannot recognise the damage that that does to Hackney's economy, he is past praying for.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): In his announcement of the abolition of targets and penalties, for which we are duly grateful, my right hon. Friend stated that they operated unfairly. Is he aware that in Buckinghamshire that unfairness has been compounded by the population problem to the point where a cut of 12·5 per cent. in capitation for schools has been precipitately made? Will my right hon. Friend look for ways to alleviate that problem before next April?

Mr. Jenkin: I am well aware of the problem, and I know that the Buckinghamshire authority will be helped by the abolition of targets. But in respect of population increase, I must remind the House that, just as there is a lag of a year or more in taking account of the most up-to-date population figures, equally there is a time lag in taking account of the latest increase in rateable value as a result of that expansion. Both those factors move in parallel. It is not right merely to look at one side of the balance sheet; both sides should be considered together. Nevertheless, I do not believe that serious harm is done to places with substantially increasing populations.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman inform rate-capped authorities such as the city of Leicester, which have been forced to cut into their already inadequate reserves, whether he proposes to provide any compensation in 1986-87 for the use of those reserves in 1985-86? Bearing in mind that the cities such as Leicester which are suffering hardship are precisely those on which there is the greates pressure to spend, will he show that the Government have some understanding of the problems that they face in trying to give service to disadvantaged people in the face of the Government's awful policy?

Mr. Jenkin: Considering that I have decided not to rate-cap Leicester next year because, according to the latest estimate, it has brought its expenditure below the level that would come within the criteria, I find the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks astonishing. If Leicester will submit a proper return, signed by a proper officer, with an accurate estimate of what it will spend this year, perhaps the city and the Department of the Environment will get on a little better.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I agree with him that Leicester should not be rate-capped again this year? The success of the Government's policy is shown by the fact that the city has kept within its budget for the coming year; it is to be congratulated on that. However, will my right hon. Friend take careful note of whether Leicester city council misbehaves in any way, and monitor the authority throughout the year? The council is scaremongering, and alleging that it will not have enough money at the end of the year.

Mr. Jenkin: Leicester is seeking to pretend that it will spend this year something over £30 million. Despite all the efforts of my very able civil servants, we cannot conceive how it will have the resources to spend more than about £25 million. If the council ends up by spending £25 million, it will bring itself below the level of the criteria for rate capping. That shows that the system is working.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Why has the Secretary of State singled out for punishment provincial capitals such as Newcastle and Liverpool which are areas of high unemployment and social deprivation? The Minister seemed to think that his announcement would be popular in Newcastle, but is he aware that the size of the Conservative group on Newcastle city council has shrunk to just over half what it was when he first became Secretary of State for the Environment? Is he further aware that among those who will undoubtedly become unemployed as a result of his announcement will be his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant)?

Mr. Jenkin: I had gained the impression from my recent visits that if Newcastle had not been included in the list of rate-capped authorities next year, that Conservative group might have found itself even smaller after next year's elections. As it is, I believe that it now has something to sell.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that, as is so often the case, Leicester can teach the rest of the country a lesson? The lesson is that rate capping need last for 12 months only and can introduce financial sanity where there was madness. That quite destroys the myth that selection has been on the basis of political vindictiveness.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that comment. We have attempted to adopt objective criteria for the determination of the selection of authorities and expenditure levels, and that is right. In regard to selection, we have obtained stability by applying the same criteria for new authorities as we had last year.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Having refused to meet members of Liverpool city council, and obviously being convinced that his policies are justifiable and defensible, will the Secretary of State join me later and speak to the wives and families of Liverpool city councillors and seek to convince them of the legitimacy of his ideas? Perhaps he is prepared to pre-empt the Prime Minister's axe by committing political suicide because when the people of Liverpool hear what he intends to do to them next year there will be a movement that will be echoed throughout the British Isles. I warn the Secretary of State on behalf of the people of Liverpool that they will be dancing on his political grave if these policies go through.

Mr. Jenkin: The House will recognise some of the pressures that I come under from Liverpool city council.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Is my right hon. Friend aware that prudent spending councils in the shires, such as that in my constituency of Kettering, will welcome his statement about the abolition of targets? However, current and capital expenditure are closely linked, for both national and local government, and last year he made a statement about voluntary restraint on capital expenditure as part of a similar statement. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there is no prospect of calling for voluntary restraint on capital expenditure and that he will make a statement to the House as soon as possible on reorganising and recasting the system of capital expenditure allocations?

Mr. Jenkin: I am sure that my hon. Friend will have noted the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson) in which I said that it was not the Government's intention at present to contemplate making a statement this year about this year's potential capital overspend, despite the fact that it might be quite considerable and any overspend will be a charge against the contingency reserve. In regard to the reform of the capital control system, we are well advanced in discussions with local authority associations. It is not a straightforward matter, but I hope that we shall be able to reach a conclusion in due course on a better system than that which we have at present.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The House realises that the Secretary of State is hoping that the rate support grant settlement will save him from the Prime Minister's award of a second ball bearing plant at Omsk. However, before he bedazzles his hon. Friends, will he tell the House how many authorities are already spending over GREA and, therefore, how many Tory authorities will come into penalty during next year? Will he also tell the House whether he intends ever to do something about the low level of services provided by many Tory authorities because that is the other side of the coin?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has not fully understood the system and I do not blame him for that because it is complex. GREA is not a substitute target so that those which go over GREA suffer penalties while those which are below it do not. We are seeking to increase the slope of the withdrawal of rate support grant as expenditure increases. Those authorities below GREA will start with a higher level of grant, but, as I said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), if they increase their expenditure sharply they will lose grant and their ratepayers will have to pay most of the excess in rates. Those whose spending is well above the level of the GREA will find that that presses more sharply. The system operates by reference to the GREAs and not by targets—that was the complaint about past expenditure patterns—and most authorities will find that it is fairer and more flexible.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in 1981, many of us keenly supported legislation designed to abolish the old rate support grant system which automatically paid more Government grant to each local authority, such as Newcastle and other profligate authorities, which spent more? It is most welcome to have returned to the original ideas for which we legislated in 1981. It will give more stability to local treasurers and benefit the more economical councils. The essence of abolishing targets and holdback means that next year more money will be distributed among councils rather than going to the Treasury. If councils wish to spend more they will lose grant progressively. There will be more money available under this system than there is for the current rate support grant in this financial year.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is right. If account is taken of the holdback on the first supplementary rate support grant report, which was debated last week, the percentage of grant next year will be higher than the percentage this year. The country was sick and tired of a system which rewarded extravagant authorities for their extravagance and penalised careful authorities for their care. The system of block grant taper has put that right.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): When will the Secretary of State realise that quoting arbitrary figures does not resolve the problems in many of the larger industrial conurbations? Is not it time that the Government recognised, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) said, that areas such as Liverpool and Newcastle suffer serious deprivation? The Government should turn to the needs of Liverpool, Newcastle and other places rather than bandy about arbitrary figures that are meaningless against the background of cities which are suffering as a consequence of the Government's policies.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman fails to recognise that the calculation of GREs takes account of the circumstances of the inner cities. Liverpool's GRE at £432 a head is the second highest of all the metropolitan areas. It is far higher than the average for metropolitan districts. Let us take some London figures. Camden has a GRE of £381 a head, Islington of £396 a head and Southwark £373 a head. The average for outer London boroughs on services excluding education—the figures must be on a comparable basis—is only £156 a head. The difference between those figures represents the differences in need, as measured by the GRE system.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): At what point will the block grant pressures, to which my right hon. Friend referred, come to bear on an authority? Will it be before or after it passes its GRE? Will there be any loss of grant by a county such as Buckinghamshire which spends around GRE?

Mr. Jenkin: An authority which spends below GRE will start with an increase in its grant. As its expenditure increases, so will the local contribution, and the grant will be reduced. If an authority spends around GRE it will receive the appropriate level of grant for doing so but if its spending rises above that level on a progressively steepening schedule it will find that its grant is withdrawn and more of its extra expenditure will have to be met by its ratepayers. Unlike the system of target and penalties, as an authority decides to spend up and so loses grant, that will be to the benefit of other authorities which have kept their spending down.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Does not the Secretary of State realise that the reason that Southwark is what he describes as a high-spending council is that it is struggling desperately to meet the needs of, and provide services for, the people of Southwark? Perhaps he ought to refer to the league table of home help provision, as his Government say that they are concerned about care in the community. The councils that he calls irresponsible are those that are actually meeting the DHSS guidelines for the number of home helps per 1,000 elderly in the community —I refer to Hackney, Lambeth, Lewisham, Haringey, Camden, Greenwich, Islington and Southwark — yet those are the councils that he is penalising. The councils who fail to meet the Government's guidelines for provision for the elderly, leaving them in the lurch, are Kingston, Sutton, Croydon, Essex, Bromley, Kensington and Chelsea, and Kingston is providing less than a quarter of the home helps required by DHSS guidelines. Is it not the Tory councils, the shameful low spenders, who are the irresponsible ones, while the Labour councils, the high spenders, are the responsible councils because they try to meet the needs of their communities?

Mr. Jenkin: Southwark's rates have risen 71 per cent. above the class average. Southwark's expenditure per head is 24 per cent. higher than the class average and its GRE recognises the difficulties to which the hon. Lady referred because it is two and a half times the size of the average outer London GRE covering the same services—that is to say, excluding education for outer London.

Southwark has spent freely and rated high, and driven many businesses away from the borough, as the many letters I have had from Southwark business men establish. The result is that unemployment is high in Southwark and no doubt many of the problems that the hon. Lady mentioned are a consequence of it. If Southwark council can be persuaded to bring its expenditure under control by making sensible economies and bringing down its rates, perhaps it can have some of the prosperity of some of the other authorities that she mentioned.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): When my right hon. Friend came to Norfolk earlier this year he was given a hard time due to intense ill-feeling in Norfolk because the county council's target for this financial year was so many million pounds below its GRE, which was having a severe effect on essential services. Today's announcement about the abolition of penalties and targets will therefore come as an enormous relief to the people of Norfolk.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Norfolk will now control its own destiny and will have the finance for essential services?

Mr. Jenkin: How much finance Norfolk county council has will depend on its decisions. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said. Norfolk has been a sensible, moderate, low-spending authority—the type of authority that should benefit from my announcement today.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman take it from me that his GRE system simply does not take proper account of multiple urban deprivation — the reason why there are high spenders in inner London—or of unemployment and the problems arising from it for local authorities? It also does not take account, because figures are out of date, of the rising population in my borough. Given that he places such emphasis on GREs, using them both as a penalty and to decide on those boroughs that need to be capped, he really ought to revise the whole system in order to bring some element of justice to it.

Mr. Jenkin: We do not expect the rate support grant system to recognise all the levels of deprivation in inner city areas, which is why the Government are spending well over £300 million a year on the urban programme. Various forms of urban programme support go to many of the authorities that complained.

The receipt of urban programme support should in no way relieve an authority of the obligation to run its own services efficiently and economically. Many inner city councils fail competely to do that because — in the language that they always use—it is always "jobs before services". They look after the trade unions and their employees and hang the ratepayers.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Does my right hon. Friend agree that despite the insinuations of the hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) and Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), his announcement will be widely welcomed and warmly applauded in Newcastle where the district rates are the highest in the country, with an increase of 23 per cent. this year and spending 30 per cent. above GRE? Does he agree that Newcastle has deliberately and knowingly priced itself into rate capping by irresponsible overspending? Nevertheless, will my right hon. Friend afford every opportunity to encourage city councillors to meet him to discuss the announcement? However at the same time, my right hon. Friend should bear in mind the heavy weight of representations made to him by ratepayers in the city about the high rates.

Mr. Jenkin: As a rate-limited authority, Newcastle city council can, under the Rates Act, apply to me for a redetermination. That will give members of the council the opportunity to meet representatives of the Department of the Environment to discuss Newcastle's financial problems.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why the document that he produces year after year does nothing more than take increasing sums of money from inner urban areas which suffer from multiple deprivation? Does he agree that the document fails to take account of the needs of the people in the borough of Islington and instead seeks to make enormous cuts in council services with a consequent loss of jobs? Will he say how much money he proposes to take this year from the 10 poorest inner urban areas? The document is a measure of vindictiveness against the poorest people and it tries to force local authorities to be in conflict with the right hon. Gentleman. He began the conflict; but he will suffer the political demise as a result.

Mr. Jenkin: I remind the hon. Gentleman that Islington's GRE per head is £396, 2·5 times the size of the comparable GRE per head for the average outer London boroughs. Those figures demonstrate clearly that the system takes account of the social needs of inner city authorities. If Islington had been able to maintain the 3 per cent. downward trend in the number of employees instead of increasing its full-time employees by 19 per cent. since 1981, perhaps Islington's rates would not be so high as to drive businesses out of the borough. Unemployment would have been lower. There would have been more rate income and the people of Islington would have been better off. It passes my understanding why Left-wing councils cannot understand that simple arithmetic.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole county of Lincoln will welcome the announcement, for which I campaigned, first, because a decreasing amount of precious resources will be drained away into the higher-spending authorities. Secondly, while Lincolnshire has cut £5 million in waste and consistently spends below GRE, it has been forced to spend above target because of the sparsity factor which entails almost £4 million for school transport costs alone.

Can my right hon. Friend now offer Lincolnshire more hope on the sparsity factor and on capital balances? May we say that we are now in the business of rewarding the friends of low spending in the shires instead of sustaining the apologists for high waste in the cities?

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. I acknowledge the part that he and others played in campaigning for the end of targets. The target system was intended to rein back the rapidly increasing local authority expenditure overall. That has succeeded. The average per year before 1980 was more than 3 per cent. in real terms while this year's spending has been static. That is a considerable achievement by local authorities. It would not have been achieved without the target system. Now we can move to a system which, I hope, will be fairer. GREs and sparsity factors will be discussed between my Department and local authority associations between now and December.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): However the right hon. Gentleman dresses it up, penalties are penalties. If the slope is increased that will obviously affect local authorities, especially the caring Labour ones. One of the problems that the Secretary of State seems to miss continually is that of the extra pressures on inner cities.

Will the Secretary of State let us know as soon as possible when he has finally decided on GREs and the effects of the transfer of services? Does he agree that those measures are likely to cause a 300 per cent. rise in bus fares in Sheffield and south Yorkshire? If not, will he state categorically that that will not happen?

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that the Sheffield's budget this year has taken its spending below the figure of 20 per cent. over GRE and it, too, has taken itself out of rate capping.

We wish to ensure that successor authorities know the financial consequences of abolition as soon as possible, but that task has not been made easier by authorities such as the hon. Gentleman's which, until yesterday, refused point blank to take part in discussions. I very much welcome the decision of the national executive committee of the Labour party yesterday to end that non-compliance.

The hon. Gentleman's second point, is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. He will no doubt clarify the matter when he makes his announcement about the transport joint boards' expenditure levels later in the year.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Does the Secretary of State agree that in boroughs such as Lambeth the reduction in the level of rate support grant is only a shift in the burden of taxation from those most able to bear it to those least able to do so? Does he agree, too, that the rate capping of Lambeth for a second time cuts services for those least able to bear them? Next year, all the London boroughs will be up for election, so why does not the Secretary of State leave the choice on such matters in Lambeth and elsewhere to the electorate? The Secretary of State has already confessed that he has become redundant and is rabid about the opposition of Labour authorities.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman should hang his head in shame at the way in which Lambeth council behaved in the first three months of this financial year. The way in which Councillor Ted Knight led the mob to town halls of other London boroughs in an attempt to intimidate them not to make their rates was disgraceful. He got his comeuppance when his council decided, at long last, to make a rate. The auditors' procedures have now started and are, of course, outside my control.

I cannot possibly agree with the hon. Gentleman. Relatively few high-spending authorities have shown themselves impervious to ratepayers' pressure and have placed intolerable burdens on them. That is why the Rates Act was passed; rate capping has saved ratepayers in the capital authorities over £300 million.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): If the high rates are responsible for job losses, why has the Conservative-controlled borough of Trafford, which has adhered slavishly to Government policy, lost far more jobs per head than the city of Manchester? Will the Secretary of State also say whether he feels more sympathy for my constituents in Trafford who will be deprived of services because the council wants to follow a Government diktat; or for my constituents in the city of Manchester who will be deprived of those same services because the Government make the city council underspend?

Mr. Jenkin: The city of Manchester has the highest GRE per head of all the metropolitan districts, and so receives substantial help from the Government. No one has ever questioned that Trafford has suffered seriously in the recession, but its council recognised that its problems would have been much worse if it had increased its rates sharply. It kept its expenditure firmly under control and will benefit from the new arrangements next year.

Mr. Pike: Will the Secretary of State not recognise that most people in the country will regard the package that he announced this afternoon as a con trick? It may benefit some local authorities but it will switch the attack quite viciously to others. For instance, Lancashire county council will benefit as a result because it will be able to spend up to its GRE without being heavily penalised. It will spend that money because it needs to do so, and there will be no rate reduction for the county. By comparison, Burnley—because its target is currently 50 per cent. above GRE—will lose cash, and that is a penalty. Can the Minister not accept that if he wishes to make the GRE the main plank of his RSG settlement he needs to get the basic matter right and base it on the needs of the local authority and not on the present system, which no one can understand, and which his Department cannot explain?

Mr. Jenkin: The GRE, as the hon. Gentleman will know if he studies the Blue Book which we publish each year, is a sophisticated way of seeking to represent precisely what he said about the needs of individual authorities.

Perhaps I should say, lest the hon. Gentleman has been misled, that in order to avoid excessive grant gains or losses as a result of the changes embodied in my announcement today, for all authorities there will be safety nets on losses and limits on grant gains. That will bring a measure of stability to the system, which I know many local authorities are anxious to see.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the consultation paper, which he has published today in conjunction with this statement, says that he proposes "the steepening of the schedule at 10 per cent. above GRE as under the existing arrangements . . . these changes would significantly increase the marginal cost to authorities of additional spending"?

Does that not mean, in plain English, that authorities spending in excess of 10 per cent. over their GRE will suffer a loss of grant through a penalty?

Mr. Jenkin: The answer is that certainly they will find that as they increase their spending above GRE, above 5 per cent., above 10 per cent., a higher and higher proportion of that additional spending will have to be met by ratepayers. With respect, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Mr. Hampson) said, that is exactly what he was hoping the system would do. He recognises that this system will not let high-spending authorities off the hook. It contains a strong downward pressure for those authorities to economise and provide savings along the lines adumbrated by the Audit Commission.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support those authorities which seek to use the Audit Commission's report in order to deliver their services more economically.

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raise a point of order because it was in the hearing of the whole House that the Secretary of State, in response to a question from one of his hon. Friends, used the word "penalty" in response to a question about his proposals. The Secretary of State described that as a slip of the tongue. May I have your assurance, Mr. Speaker, that the exact words used by the Secretary of State in those exchanges will be recorded in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Certainly. Hansard is a verbatim report.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of the statement that we have heard this afternoon, and because of the situation in Liverpool, I should like to move the Adjournment of the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman seeking to make an application under Standing Order No. 10?

Mr. Heffer: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will have to do that after the next statement, please.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

5.24 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about my proposals for the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement for Wales.

Local councils have begun to plan their budgets for next year. To help them I am today circulating my proposals for the key elements of the 1986-87 settlement. Copies of the explanatory material sent to Welsh councils have been placed in the Library and in the Vote Office.

Before outlining my proposals it is important briefly to summarise the record of Welsh authorities in recent years, as this has had a major bearing on my strategy for 1986-87.

Local government spending on services in the 1960s and 1970s grew by 3 per cent. or more a year in real terms, absorbing an ever-increasing share of the national product. I am pleased to say that in Wales this damaging trend has been halted. Spending in the present year is only fractionally higher, in cost terms, than in 1979. Since 1979 the average annual increase in rates has been 30 per cent. lower than when Labour was last in office. The total rise since 1979 has been seven percentage points below the change in the RPI.

Success in reining back current spending has also enabled me to release a significant amount of resources for capital investment. Gross capital spending in Wales has grown twice as fast as inflation since 1981-82. In the RSG debate last January I told the House that I would consider whether to abandon targets for 1986-87. I have now decided to do so, but at the same time to toughen the alternative means of containing spending by raising the rate at which local authorities will lose grant as their spending rises relative to GRE. I believe that this will restrain spending in a way which is as effective as, but fairer than, targets. The local authority associations, with whom I have discussd the issue in detail, are prepared to accept this as a reasonable price to pay for moving away from selective controls and for restoring a greater measure of local accountability. The precise system of controls proposed for 1986-87 has, in fact, been strongly influenced by the views of the associations, and the Welsh Counties Committee in particular.

Under the new arrangements, the great majority of councils will now face a cash reduction in grant if they opt for an above average increase in spending. An important feature of the new scheme is that it also dramatically increases the rating benefits for below average growth in spending, and I am sure that many councils will come to recognise this in the coming months.

In order to moderate some of the large poundage increases which would otherwise have come about, I have taken up the Welsh counties' idea of limiting the aggregate of GREs to a total 10 per cent. below the actual level of provision for the year.

I deal now with the level of resources. Following discussions with the associations, I propose to add £15 million to the provision for current expenditure shown in last year's public expenditure White Paper. The adjusted total proposed is £1,368 million. If councils succeed in holding their spending to that figure, by the end of this Parliament they will have met my objective of returning spending — in cost terms — to the level recorded in 1979-80.

Taking into account the other elements of spending, total relevant expenditure for RSG purposes is provisionally estimated to be £1,598 million. This is £76 million, or 5 per cent., more than the amount that authorities have budgeted to spend in the present year.

In arriving at the relevant expenditure total I have taken account of the pressure on the resources for advanced further education. The committee of the Wales Advisory Body has told me that an early decision on the size of the AFE pool would greatly assist its annual planning exercise for this sector. I have therefore proposed to the Welsh Counties Committee that the pool should total £31 million in 1986-87, an increase of £2·5 million, or 8·8 per cent., over the figure for 1985-86.

Aggregate grant in support of relevant expenditure will be £1,067 million, giving a grant percentage of 66·8 per cent., which is virtually the same figure as for the present year. In cash terms, grant is £54 million, or 5·3 per cent., higher than the level in the supplementary report for 1985-86.

The final ingredient of my proposed package is an £11 million addition to the existing provision for local authority capital investment. This enhancement of 1986-87 resources is linked directly to Welsh authorities' efforts to contain their current expenditure in 1985-86.

When all the elements of the package are taken together, the arithmetic shows that if councils spend in line with the provision which I have set, rate rises next year should not, on average, exceed the going rate of inflation. Indeed, a good number of councils will be able to cut the rate burden while still budgeting for a moderate cash increase in spending.

The tough but more straightforward and less interventionist arrangements which I intend to introduce next year should provide authorities with sufficient incentive to budget moderately, and a firmer basis on which to plan their spending effectively. Targets and holdback have been extremely successful in Wales, and I believe that the new arrangements will be equally effective.

I commend my proposals for the 1986-87 settlement to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. Gentleman beats a partial retreat. The House of Commons research staff have calculated that between 1978-79 and 1985-86 the overall cut in grant, in real terms, is over 13 per cent.

The new regime poses new problems for the district councils. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Welsh districts have performed admirably and have been co-operative? Is he aware that in spite of that they now find themselves faced with an equally penal grants system to replace the system of targets and penalties? The new system will penalise up to 31 of the 37 district authorities, as opposed to a mere five in 1985-86.

Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the vital element of 90 per cent. GRE, the safety net and gain cap limiters will be retained in future years, as requested by the Welsh district councils when they accepted the change?

The Secretary of State knows that there is a 5 per cent. increase in the counties' relevant expenditure overall. This includes only 4·5 per cent. current expenditure over and above the revised figures for the current year. Bearing in mind the teachers, police and fire service pay awards, is that adequate?. The county authorities are justifiably apprehensive. Is the right hon. Gentleman selling them short?

On the question of the block grant, will the Secretary of State recycle any grant losses below the £850 million block grant underlying the provisional statement?

The Secretary of State has attempted to paint a rosy picture on capital spending. Why are Welsh housing authorities restricted to using only 15 per cent. of the cash raised from council house sales, when the equivalent authorities in England can spend 20 per cent. of their receipts? The right hon. Gentleman has never explained why he settled for that injustice. Rhondda borough council, which faces a Herculean housing task, has had to sell £10 million-worth of its best mortgages to meet legal requirements on house renovation programmes. Would not an enlarged house building programme make major inroads into the dole queues in Wales?

Will the financial allocations not be insufficient to cope with the worst housing problems in Britain, especially those in the south Wales valleys? The allocations will not help local councils in grappling with the major unemployment crisis that has hit Wales — with more than one in five Welshmen out of work. Is it not true that the allocations are insufficient for the councils of the south Wales coalfields which face pit closures and for those coping with the closures of steel works in north Wales? Bearing in mind the previous niggardly annual settlements, this cash settlement is not at all satisfactory.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has done his best to attack what the Welsh local authorities know to be an extremely good settlement. He talked about a partial retreat. The reason why we have been able to end the target system is that the Welsh local authorities have come so close to achieving the objective that I set them of getting their spending in real terms back to where it was when the Labour Government left office. We have not reduced it below that level. We have simply stopped the upward surge in local authority expenditure.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the penal results for the Welsh districts. I do not understand how he can suggest that the system is penal when it will mean the possibility of a substantial reduction in rates in all but a tiny handful of the Welsh districts if they spend at approximately the expected level of inflation.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the district authorities' request on 90 per cent. GRE, limiters and so on. When the authorities asked me about that at the consultative council meeting this afternoon, I referred them to our previous discussions in that council.I reminded them that over the period during which we have had a separate Welsh rate support grant system, I had met the undertakings that I had given. No one can give absolute guarantees about the exact mechanisms in the period ahead, but just as they, on the whole, have co-operated with the Government under the separate Welsh rate support grant system, so, of course, shall I endeavour to meet the commitments that I have made.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the problems of current expenditure. The provision that we have made is certainly attainable by Welsh local authorities. The Audit Commission has shown the substantial scope that exists for improvements in efficiency and the local authority associations accept that there is room for further savings through efficiency.

I come now to the issue of teachers' pay. If only we could have a settlement and get the NUT to accept the Government's proposals before October, we could make an adjustment in the additional resources which the Government have said could be available for next year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment made that point. In any case, the level of the settlement does not alter the fact that the Audit Commission's figures and pupil numbers show that scope for reductions exist, as there has been a substantial fall in pupil numbers over recent years.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned recycling. We intend that resources should be retained by Welsh local authorities. I have told local authorities that I intend to discuss with them in the coming months a system that will mean that those resources will return to the low-spending authorities and not to those which have spent at a high level and have therefore incurred reduced grant.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about capital allocations and housing. Decisions on those matters will be taken in the normal way in the autumn. They have not yet been taken. The £15 million to which I referred is a capital allocation which relates solely to the current expenditure performance of local authorities. The hon. Gentleman's argument on the need for capital expenditure in Wales will be considered in the normal way in the public expenditure round and will be announced in the autumn.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement today will give general satisfaction throughout Wales and will be regarded as a result of the firm and clear leadership that he has given in this matter?

Am I right in thinking that this marks the beginning of a move towards a more rational system of lcoal government financing in which local authorities will have a real incentive to provde the best services that they can at the lowest possible cost, and that it also marks the beginning of the end of the unhealthy situation in which local authorities seek to shift the blame on to the Government for their difficulties, and the Government in their turn blame local authorities for everything that goes wrong?

Mr. Edwards: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that. He is absolutely right about the incentives provided under the present arrangements. There is a direct incentive for authorities to contain their expenditure, because it enables them to reduce the burden on those who pay rates.

In Clwyd the county precept is projected to rise by only about 2·8 per cent. if the council can limit the year-to-year growth in its spending to 5 per cent. Among the districts, only Colwyn is projected to require a rate increase for spending 5 per cent. more in 1986-87, and even then it is only a tiny percentage increase. Substantial rate reductions are in prospect for several district authorities in Clwyd.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I welcome the Secretary of State's retreat from targets, and also the recent increase in consultation with local authorities, but I wonder whether the new estimated figure for total relevant expenditure for RSG purposes reveals the fact that there will continue to be a decline, in real terms, in the level of housing, planning services and environmental health services provided by district councils. Equally, will there not be a decline in education and in social, fire and consumer protection services provided by county councils?

Is it not unseemly for the Secretary of State to continue to play the role of the miserly Mr. Bumble, making the Welsh local authorities come to him, month after month, like Oliver Twist, asking for more?

Mr. Edwards: At the start of his question the hon. and learned Gentleman congratulated me on the increased consultation, and in fact I have consulted frequently. At the end of his question he appeared to be complaining because the local authorities discuss these matters with me every month.

The truth is that there is no basis whatever for the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion that there need be the cuts in services of which he spoke. We are increasing relevant expenditure by about 5 per cent. — which is more than the expected rate of inflation. Although current expenditure provision is increased by rather less than the expected rate of inflation, it takes account of the fact that the Audit Commission has shown that substantial savings are still possible through greater efficiency.

Local authorities themselves have in the past year or two begun to show that they can make improvements in efficiency without cutting services. Anyone who thinks that there is no further room for improvement knows nothing about local government — either in Wales or anywhere else. That may well be the case with the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge the responsible role played by local authorities in Wales, which has enabled him to make the increases in both capital and current expenditure for which so many of us have campaigned?

I acknowledge my right hon. Friend's helpful leadership, and he will know that I welcome the abolition of targets, which I have for long told him were an unfortunate, and, I hope, temporary, measure. We can now get back to greater local authority autonomy over expenditure?

On my reckoning, should Ynys Môn borough council budget in line with an inflation rate of 5 per cent. next year, it will lead to a rate reduction of 11 per cent. for its people. Will my right hon. Friend confirm those figures? I estimate that that is the seventh largest reduction of any local authority in Wales. That must be good for business locally, and on that so much of our future employment depends.

Finally, will my right hon. Friend confirm that when he comes to take his decisions this autumn he will take into account the large backlog of home improvement grants waiting to be processed?

Mr. Edwards: I certainly acknowledge that my hon. Friend has campaigned relentlessly on the subject of targets. His is one of the many voices to which I have listened on the subject.

I can also confirm the figures that my hon. Friend gave for the Government's projections about possible rate reductions. The actual rate set by any district will depend upon the decisions that the district council takes. When we make our assumptions, we are saying that if councils spend broadly 5 per cent. more than they did in the same budgets last year, and if they achieve the same balances, figures of this order will be achieved. There is scope for reduction in the rate burden.

I confirm that we shall, of course, consider the backlog of improvement grants when we come to take our decisions on capital in the autumn. I remind my hon. Friend that, as a result of the good behaviour of Welsh local authorities and even before my announcement today, capital expenditure in Wales is twice the level per head of that in England.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Is not the only extra freedom announced the freedom to choose between the rack and the thumbscrew? Is not the reality of the Secretary of State's so-called success story today that after his six years in office, and after an extra £40,000 million has gone from the North sea into the Government's coffers, our local authorities are expected to manage on real resources which are no greater than they were when the Government came to office?

Moreover, with the same resources—fewer of which now come from the Government—councils are expected to meet the extra social costs of having an extra 2 million people unemployed and of the essential social costs of services, such as housing benefit, which previously were met by the Government. Is it not a recipe, inevitably, for further cuts? Will the Secretary of State confirm that, of all the Welsh counties, West Glamorgan will lose the most as a result of this so-called improvement?

Mr. Edwards: Welsh local authorities do not share the right hon. Gentleman's view about the proposed change. The Welsh counties, including the representative from West Glamorgan, advocated the change as a great improvement on the previous arrangement.

I acknowledge, of course, that, of all the counties, West Glamorgan will have the greatest difficulty with this change. It will have the largest prospective rate increases, although that is because its expenditure is higher in relation to GRE than that of any other Welsh local authority, and its spending record is greater. That is the explanation.

I am grateful to have the right hon. Gentleman's acknowledgement that we have not cut local government expenditure in real terms, but merely sought to get it back to what it was when his Government left office. I am sorry that he of all people has not yet learned the direct relationship between the level of local authority expenditure and the rate burden and job creation and the viability of businesses in the area. There is no doubt that the local authorities which spend most and rate highest are those which drive away prospective employers.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the synthetic indignation displayed by the Opposition will not be echoed by local authority treasurers, who know that high rates drive away business and cause misery to countless people, that the rate burden counts towards the retail prices index, and that that in turn has an affect on wage settlements and the economy of the whole country? My right hon. Friend is to be warmly congratulated on the leadership that he has given in Wales in this respect.

Mr. Edwards: I am not sure that it is right to talk about synthetic indignation, when only a tiny handful of Welsh Labour Members have bothered to turn up for this debate. Perhaps they knew that it was not necessary to attack the rate settlement, and that is why they kept away.

I have a word of caution about possible rate effects in South Glamorgan, because that county has made heavy use of reserves in the current year, and I suspect that that may have to be paid for subsequently.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): When the right hon. Gentleman talks about 1979 and the extent of the rates in Ogwr borough and Mid-Glamorgan county, is he aware of the difference between the situation then and now? When he talks about rating and attracting industrialists to place such as Ogmore and Maesteg, does he realise that his Government's economic policies have caused factories and pits to close? As a result, there are fewer ratepayers to pay rates to the Ogwr borough—not because of the policies of Ogwr borough or the county, but because of the Government's economic policies.

Last week the right hon. Gentleman imposed a restriction, with a total of £844,000 for Mid-Glamorgan and £446,000 for Ogwr borough. When the new procedure comes in next year—I hope, incidentally, that it will be arithmetically correct, unlike the last ones, so that treasurers can reasonably assess the position—what will he say to the 2,000 applicants for council accommodation in Ogwr borough, who were told that under the present system, with the present restrictions by the Secretary of State, they would be lucky to be housed in 10 years' time?

Mr. Edwards: As a result of our ability to control current spending in Wales, there has been a substantial increase in capital allocations for Welsh local authorities. Another £15 million has been announced in the statement, which will help to ease the housing burdens mentioned by the hon. Gentleman and help to provide facilities for the jobs that he wishes to create. That is in marked contrast to the slashing cuts in capital spending which resulted from the pilgrimage of the Labour Chancellor to the IMF during the Labour Government's term of office.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on once again obtaining such a favourable settlement for Wales. Does he agree that the lesson for local authorities is that if they can get their current spending under control, additional capital resources will be available? Will he persist in that message to Clwyd county council in particular? Will he try to convince its councillors that if they reduce their rates that will help to create more jobs, and that they should concentrate on their statutory obligations and take on board the Audit Commission's message that they are grossly overmanned in some of their departments?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend is right to refer to the relationship between current and capital spending. I believe that in my previous answer I mentioned £15 million extra, when the figure should be £11 million.

Mr. Barry Jones: Wrong again.

Mr. Edwards: That is characteristic of the childish conduct of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). The day on which he announced additional capital spending for Wales would be a day indeed.

If Clwyd county council manages its affairs sensibly, there will be a very modest rate increase. In the hon. Gentleman's borough, there is the prospect of a rate reduction.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I hope that Clwyd county council will look after the needs of its people and not apply policies advocated by the hon. Member for Dlyn (Mr. Raffan). The Secretary of State said that he had consulted the county associations and that they were fairly agreeable to the new regime. Does he not think that the local authority associations feel themselves to be under the hammer and that they will accept any crumb from the table? Does he not also think that they loathe the policy of incessant meddling in local government practised by the Government since 1979 and that they detest the centralised Whitehall jackboot policies that have been pursued?

Is there anything that the Secretary of State can do to exempt local authorities which want to encourage industrial development in their areas — he must remember that the Government's economic policies are falling to pieces with the continuing increase in unemployment — from capping and return of block grant? Or can he improve the safety net so that they can spend on industrial development without detriment to any of their other functions?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman talks about centralisation. He seems to forget that the Government introduced a separate Welsh rate support grant system, which has been widely welcomed by Welsh local authorities. They know that it has been administered so as to produce enormous benefit to Welsh local authorities and that their relative position has been much improved because they have behaved more sensibly than many extreme Labour authorities in England. The best contribution that the hon. Gentleman's local district can make to industrial recovery in Wrexham is to spend in line with or below inflation. There will then be the prospect of a 16 per cent. rate reduction. I can think of no more substantial contribution to attract industry.

Mr. Barry Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has recently given many wrong answers to questions, both in the Chamber and in Committee. He has also presented faulty documents. When he next has a statement to make, I shall be prepared to go over it with him beforehand.

Mr. Edwards: Once again the hon. Gentleman, who takes his responsibilities so seriously, has not bothered to listen. The statement was perfectly correct, but, in answering a question across the Dispatch Box, I gave a figure which I immediately corrected. I also note, and I hope that the people of Wales will note, that that is the only criticism that the hon. Member is able to make of the settlement, which he knows is one of the best rate support grant settlements to be given to the people of Wales in many years.

Liverpool City Council

5.55 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the position of the Liverpool city council arising out of the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Environment today plus the already serious rate and budgetary problems in the city which, unless resolved by negotiation, can lead to cuts in services, loss of jobs and possible surcharges and disqualification of councillors."

I think that the matter is specific because clearly there is a serious problem in the city. It is important because people's futures are at stake. Councillors could have their homes taken from them and their wives and families placed in great difficulties and Liverpool city council workers could find themselves out of work and on the streets. It is also urgent because the matter will clearly develop to a greater degree unless negotiations take place before the end of the recess. I honestly believe that serious problems of unrest in Liverpool could arise unless the matter is resolved by negotiations. It is therefore important for the House to debate the matter before we rise for the recess.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the position of the Liverpool city council arising out of the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Environment today."

I have listened with the greatest care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Finance Act 1985.
2. Appropriation Act 1985.
3. Interception of Communications Act 1985.
4. Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol etc.) Act 1985.
5. Trustee Savings Banks Act 1985.
6. Wildlife and Countryside (Service of Notices) Act 1985.
7. Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985.
8. East Lothian District Council (Musselburgh Links, etc.) Order Confirmation Act 1985.
9. Shetland Islands Council Order Confirmation Act 1985.
10. Hastings Pier Act 1985.
11. Oxfordshire Act 1985.

Social Security

5.59 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 5th July, be approved.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it would be for the convenience of the House to take with this the following motions:

That the draft Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Amendment and Up-rating Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 8th July, be approved.

That the draft Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 8th July, be approved.

That the draft Child Benefit (Up-rating) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 5th July, be approved.

That the draft Family Income Supplements (Computation) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 5th July, be approved.

That the draft Housing Benefits (Increase of Needs Allowances) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 5th July, be approved.

That the draft Pensioners' Lump Sum Payments Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 5th July, be approved.

That the draft Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 Statutory Sum Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 22nd July, be approved.

That the draft Social Security Benefit (Dependency) Amendment Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 22nd July, be approved.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Housing Benefits (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1100), dated 16th July 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 17th July, be annulled.

Mr. Speaker: Is that for the convenience of the House?

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: So be it.

Mr. Newton: The orders are accompanied by a report from the Government Actuary on the effects of the proposals on the national insurance fund and by a statement from my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, on the background to the uprating proposed for the mobility allowance.

The statutory instruments put into effect the uprating of social security benefits announced in the House on 18 June by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. They also provide for the payment of the £10 Christmas bonus, an increase in vaccine damage payments and other changes to which I shall come later in my speech.

As the House is aware, it is the Government's intention that this should be the last November uprating before the move to annual upratings which will take place from April 1987. To pave the way for that change, we have taken powers in the Social Security Act 1985 to enable us to undertake the 1986 uprating in July — four months earlier than usual. The result is that after November 1985 there will then be two upratings at eight-month intervals, in July 1986 and April 1987. That move has been welcomed as sensible on both sides of the House and well beyond it.

Rather than catalogue the details and technicalities of each of the orders, it will be more helpful if I merely remind the House of the main features of the upratings and then deal with some of the issues upon which it seems right to comment further.

For the majority of benefits, including retirement pensions, unemployment benefit, widow's benefit and war pensions, the uprating orders provide for an increase of 7 per cent.—the full measured increase in the retail price increase in the 12 months from May 1984 toMay 1985. For a single person, the retirement pension will increase by £2.50 per week — from £35.80 to £38.30; for couples the increase will be £4 a week—from £57.30 to £61.30. The full rate widow's pension will rise in line with the single person's retirement pension.

Those increases, once again, clearly fulfil the Government's firm and continuing commitment to protect the value of the basic retirement pension. As the House is aware, since the Government first took office in 1979, that promise has been more than fulfilled. When this increase takes effect in November 1985, pensions will have increased by about 96 per cent. since November 1978— 10 per cent. more than the expected rise in prices over the same period.

I should emphasise, because it is a point that is not always sufficiently appreciated, that that improvement in the pension's real value has been achieved at the same time as the number of retirement pensioners has increased by about 800,000, taking the total number of retirement pensioners from 8·3 million to 9·1 million. Against that background, the Government's record of more than maintaining the value of retirement pensions is one of which my hon. Friends can be proud.

Alongside those increases in pensions and many other benefits, the supplementary benefit and the housing benefit needs allowances will also be appropriately increased by the orders. In the case of supplementary benefit, the increase is 5·1 per cent., in line with the increase in the retail price index between May 1984 and May 1985, less the element of housing costs. As the House is aware, that difference in uprating methods merely reflects the fact that for those on supplementary benefit housing costs are, for the most part, met separately through the housing benefit system.

With regard to housing benefit, the needs allowance generally will be increased by between 5·5 and 6·2 per cent., again in accordance with the usual rather complicated formula. The one exception is the child's needs allowance, which is being increased by more than the usual formula would have required.

While talking about housing benefit, I should refer to the uprating of non-dependant deductions. That has been the subject of some comment. It is also provided for in the regulations before the House. The purpose of non-dependant deductions is to take account of the contribution towards housing costs which is assumed to be made by a non-dependant living in a beneficiary's household. The deductions are therefore uprated in line with changes in housing costs. That formula, which follows previous practice under the supplementary benefit scheme, has been in place since the introduction of the housing benefit scheme. The same formula is also applied to the supplementary benefit non-householder housing addition. The normal method of uprating the non-dependant deduction and that non-householder housing addition in supplementary benefit has been applied this year.

I am aware that anxiety has been expressed that the statement and schedule accompanying my right hon. Friend's statement on 18 June did not include the figures for those deductions. As I explained in a written answer to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 8 July, we were following previous practice. On this and previous occasions, the practice has been for the uprating statement to give details of increases in the main weekly benefit rates but not increases in the considerable number of minor benefit items.

It was solely for that reason that the increases in non-dependant deductions were not referred to. Clearly the House has the opportunity to consider them, as it does this afternoon, when the relevant statutory instruments are laid before the House. Nevertheless, having said that, I hope that I have made it clear, against the implications that the hon. Member for Oldham, West sought to establish earlier — that there had been some attempt to conceal, abnormally, what the proposals and the uprating methods were — that there was no departure from previous practice.

In view of the comments made on this occasion, we shall clearly have that matter in mind when considering what should be put in the scheduled list of the uprating of benefits next year. I am glad to see the hon. Member Oldham, West nodding, because we do not wish to convey the impression, which he evidently first gained, that we have in some way sought to conceal matters. That was far from our intention. [Interruption.] I am sorry to see the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) conveying some disbelief at that statement. I hope that I have made it clear that we were merely following normal practice.

Before leaving the issue of housing benefit, I should refer to the proposal contained in my right hon. Friend's uprating statement to increase the rates taper from 9 to 13 per cent., which does not feature in the orders before the House. That proposal is not contained in the orders because, unlike others in respect of housing benefit contained in the uprating, it is subject to consultation with the local authorities, and we wish to ensure that adequate time is allowed for that process of consultation and then for us to consider the responses that we receive. When we have considered them, we shall take the action necessary to implement the conclusions at which we arrive. No doubt the House will want to have the opportunity to debate whatever proposal is put forward when it resumes in the autumn.

I wish to deal with benefits for families. The House will be aware that the orders provide for an increase in child benefit of 15p — from £6·85 to £7. The Government have made clear their continuing view that it is right to maintain child benefit as a non-means-tested, non-taxable benefit normally payable to the mother, and the fact that it is inevitably necessary to make a judgment about the appropriate level at the time of each uprating decision and to make that judgment in the context of social priorities and the social security budget as a whole.

On this occasion—this is a subject that the House has already debated—we concluded that that increase to £7 was the appropriate increase for child benefit generally, and that it was right to make a special increase at the same time in those aspects of benefit which apply to lower paid families in work with children. I now come to those changes.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): How much money will the Government save by not uprating child benefit in line with prices? As to the increases in the other benefits for families, how much of that money saved will be paid in benefit? When the new family credit comes in, will there be a commitment to use all the savings from child benefit to finance that?

Mr. Newton: The answer to the first half of the hon. Gentleman's intervention is that in a full year the saving from the uprating to £7, rather than a 7 per cent. increase to take account of the rise in prices over the full year from May to May, is £175 million. The cost of the various measures to which I am about to turn in respect of lower income families is about £26 million in a full year.

The answer to the second half of the hon. Gentleman's question is that, just as we must make a judgment in the context of this uprating about the appropriate level of child benefits, when we come to make decisions about the rates to be set in relation to such proposals as we may implement following the review, we shall also have to make a judgment on the balance of all considerations in the context of the social security budget as a whole.

Mr. Field: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that that is a change in the Government's position from the time of the uprating statement? The Secretary of State then said that the reason for this cut in child benefit was to enable money to be targeted on the poorest. Clearly he is now leaving the option for some of that money to be taken from families to be given in tax cuts to single people. That is hardly targeting.

Mr. Newton: I do not accept that there is any difference in meaning or emphasis from what I have said now and on previous occasions and what the Secretary of State has said on previous occasions. Our positon is quite clear. We believe in maintaining the child benefit system in the terms in which I have just presented it. We also believe that it is right to accord particular priority—in looking at the social security structure as a whole and, particularly, when considering the balance of benefits for families—to the needs of lower paid families, especially such families in work. The hon. Gentleman is straining a bit in suggesting that there is some major change in emphasis in what I have just said.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has raised an important point. The Minister has said that in real terms the cut in child benefit is about £175 million. As my hon. Friend pointed out, the Secretary of State said that the motive was to concentrate resources on families in greatest need. Will the Minister confirm that the value of the improvement in family income supplement and housing benefit child needs allowance together comes to about £23 million, which is about only 13 per cent. of the cut in child benefit?

Mr. Newton: Had the hon. Gentleman been listening about three minutes ago he would have heard me give the figure, which is around £26 million, but I do not seek to build too much on that.

As the House is aware, these orders propose an increase in family income supplement prescribed allowance by more than 7 per cent. and introduce an element of age relation into the scheme by setting new higher prescribed amounts for families with older children. The new prescribed amounts for a one-child family will be £97·50 a week where the child is under 11; £98·50 where the child is 11 to 15 years old; and £99·50 where the child is 16 to 19 and still at school. For each additional child the prescribed amount will increase by £11·50, £12·50 and £13·50, again depending on the age of the child.

As well as targeting help more effectively, this measure will help mitigate the effects of the unemployment trap, which is a matter of concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House, by aligning more closely the rates paid to low-income working families with children and the rates paid to families who are unemployed and receiving supplementary benefit. To the same end, we are increasing the housing benefit child needs allowance by about £1 a week more than a normal uprating would require.

I should also emphasise that we are increasing one-parent benefit by the full extent of the 7 per cent. general uprating from £4.25 a week to £4.55 a week. The children's scale rates within the supplementary benefit scheme—which apply to the least-well-off families out of work—are also increased by the full supplementary benefit uprating percentage.

Taken together, those measures targeted to low-income families, and especially to low-income working families, are of very significant additional help to such families, especially when taken with the changes in national insurance contributions that were announced in the Budget and that are due to come into effect in October this year.

To give some idea of the importance of those changes taken together, if I compare what we are proposing, including the national insurance changes, with what would have happened had a normal uprating been carried out, it shows that a married couple, with one child aged 3, with gross earnings of £80 a week will be £2.02 a week better off than they would otherwise have been; a married couple on the same earnings with two children aged 4 and 6 will be £2.43 a week better off than they would otherwise have been; and a married couple with three children aged 3, 8 and 11 will be some £3.18 better off. I know that on this at least I shall carry the hon. Member for Birkenhead with me in regarding those as useful improvements for a group of the population for whom in the past we have perhaps not done enough through the social security benefits system or in other ways.

Mr. Field: The Minister certainly carries me with him on that point, but are not his considerable debating skills yet again being used in the Chamber to disguise a significant change in Government policy? Until very recently the Government were concerned with two objectives—the living standards of poor families and the living standards of all families. Is there not now a marked change? While there is concern for the very poorest—although some of us may debate how effective the changes are — the Government have gone back on their commitment to ensure that living standards and the tax burden are shared equally between those with children and those without. Is not that a very significant change indeed?

Mr. Newton: I do not believe that the Government have gone back on their commitment, although I accept that in the context of this uprating there is a difference of opinion between the Government and the views held by the hon. Gentleman about how that commitment is best fulfilled. He will have read what has been said in the social security review Green Paper and will be well aware of the emphasis placed in that paper on the needs of families with children. But particularly—and we do not run away from the word "particularly"—the emphasis is on the needs of low-income families with children, not least on low-income families in work who have children. That is a sensible reflection of sensible social priorities.

I wish to turn to the questions arising from these orders relating to benefits for disabled people. I remind the House that, in line with the general uprating figures, mobility allowance will rise from £20 to £21·40 a week. That means that it has far more than doubled since the Government took office. The higher rate of attendance allowance will rise from £28·60 to £30·60. The lower rate of attendance allowance will rise from £19·10 to £20·45. The rate of severe disablement allowance—the replacement for non-contributory invalidity pension—will go up from £21·50 a week to £23.

I wish to draw particular attention to the fact that those on the contributory invalidity pension will receive an uprating well beyond the rate of inflation at 7 per cent., and in all that will amount to an increase of 12 per cent. That will be worth more than £4 a week to single beneficiaries and £6·50 a week to married couples. That is because, as the House is aware, we are restoring the 5 per cent. abatement of invalidity pension, despite the fact that at present there are no immediate plans to bring the benefit into taxation, even though we have always said that that is the intention in the longer term.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Minister confirm that nevertheless the changes in the offset of the additional component in the invalidity allowance mean that the Government are making a net saving?

Mr. Newton: I was about to come to the other changes that I would not wish to disguise from the House. One of them is covered in the regulations, and I wish to make particular reference to it. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has already referred to an aspect that is not covered in these regulations but which is covered in the Social Security Bill that was passed earlier this week, and that is the measures we have taken in relation to the invalidity allowance addition, which is paid at a higher rate to those who become sick and disabled at an early stage in their life, as against the earnings-related additional component.

I wish to refer to another aspect, the way for which was paved in the Social Security Bill. It is also reflected in the Social Security Benefit (Dependency) Amendment Regulations which are part of the package that we are debating. It provides for a new form of earnings rule for adult dependants of recipients of certain long-term benefits. As the hon. Lady knows from my replies to parliamentary questions, we intend to set the level of the new earnings rule—which is an equal treatment earnings rule that extends our provisions for equal treatment under the social security system—at the rate of unemployment benefit, which is now £28·45 a week. It will be increased to £30·45 a week from November.

We intend to apply the earnings rule to the wives of invalidity pension husbands and also to the husbands of invalidity pensioner wives. The net effect is to create a more generous rule for the husbands of women who are in receipt of long-term benefit, in particular invalidity pension, but it is a rather less generous rule than the present one for the wives of men who are receiving a similar range of benefits. By linking the level of the earnings rule to the rate of unemployment benefit, we ar adopting a common sense position. By the time people are earning more than they could achieve on their own contribution record if they were out of work, it is hardly sensible to regard them as any longer dependent upon somebody else who is receiving social security benefit. We shall also ensure that the earnings rule is regularly increased. It will be increased in line with changes in unemployment benefit.

I should emphasise that this measure will come into effect on 16 September but that there will be no cash losers. It will apply only to new claimants after that date.

The hon. Member for Derby, South has already expressed interest in the last point I wish to make on this subject. Originally we said that as part of a series of changes that would affect invalidity pensioners we intended to move to fortnightly payment of benefit in arrears. The hon. Lady has been probing me about the Government's intentions. She will by now be aware that, in the light of the general proposition in the social security Green Paper to seek more consistency and greater alignment between the payment mechanisms and other forms of rules affecting a whole variety of social security benefits, we have thought it right to defer the implementation of that proposal and to give further consideration to it in the wider context of the Green Paper.

I turn to a number of particular supplementary benefit issues other than the general uprating of supplementary benefit with which I have already dealt. We propose to make two changes to the supplementary heating additions which will be uprated generally by the rise in fuel prices. This was 4·4 per cent. between May 1984 and May 1985. First, we intend to limit the central heating additions. They were introduced in the early 1960s when the few claimants with central heating undoubtedly spent more than other claimants on fuel. The position has changed markedly. About half of all claimants now have central heating. Central heating is more efficient than most other systems of heating houses. Claimants with gas and electric central heating systems spent less, on average, on heating than claimants without central heating.

In these circumstances, we have decided to make no further awards of such additions in this category to claimants after 5 August. Claimants who were entitled to central heating additions before 5 August will receive them while they are still on benefit and remain eligible under the current rules, but from that date no new central heating additions will be awarded to new claimants. I want to emphasise that other heating additions will continue under a variety of headings. I re-emphasise the point I made at the beginning: all heating additions are being uprated to the full normal extent—that is, by the price index that measures the increase in fuel costs.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The Minister has not provided figures for the savings on central heating allowances. However, in a full year they amount to about £55 million. No fewer than 1 million families will be affected. Is he aware that a number of hon. Members disagree fundamentally with his statement about central heating costs? In many cases they are a burden to families. I have received representations on this point from a number of constituents. If expenditure upon this kind of heating allowance is not as high as it might be, it is because people feel that they cannot afford to turn on the heating. This causes widespread concern among the elderly, especially since this rule has been introduced at such short notice. Many hon. Members are anxious about a saving of this kind being slipped through in what appears to be a rather surreptitious way, although large sums of money are involved.

Mr. Newton: It can hardly be said to be surreptitious when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services devoted the best part of a paragraph of his statement on 18 June to this point. Savings are involved. The figure for a full year will be about £38 million. It will increase in future years because claimants who are already on benefit and in receipt of a central heating addition will continue to receive it. So the effects are not quite the same as they would be with a normal social security change.

Mr. Millan: The figure I was given in a parliamentary answer relates presumably to savings which take into account the fact that present recipients will continue to receive the addition, unless they come off benefit, however temporarily. The figure that was given in a parliamentary answer was £55 million for a full year.

Mr. Newton: I suspect that the difference between us is that the figures I have in front of me relate to 1986-87, whereas the right hon. Member is referring to 1987-88. That ties in with my point that this builds up a little, because existing claimants are protected. To pick up the main thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's point, those who are already in receipt of supplementary pension will be protected in the way that I have already stated. Moreover, any householder over the age of 65 will receive a heating addition.

Mr. Millan: But at a lower rate.

Mr. Newton: No, not necessarily at a lower rate. Anybody who is over the age of 85 will receive a heating addition at a higher rate than this. That would nullify any central heating addition to which they were entitled. We give the claimants the highest heating addition to which they are entitled. A significant number of pensioners below the age of 85 may be in receipt of higher heating additions under other provisions, including those that are directed to the need of the long-term sick and the disabled. Although I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point and the point that no doubt the hon. Member for Birkenhead is burning to make, I would ask them not to overplay their hand when considering the effect of these proposals.

Mr. Frank Field: As the Minister for Social Security is anxious that I should not overplay my hand, and as he therefore thinks that the point I am about to make is not very important, may I ask him whether I am right in saying that after 5 August people will cease to be eligible for a heating addition on the ground that they have central heating? As the point I am making is so unimportant and as the costs involved will, presumably, also be unimportant, can the Minister say what steps he will take between now and 5 August to tell those of our constituents who are eligible for this benefit that they should put in a claim before 5 August because on 6 August they will cease to be eligible? Will he be appearing on the popular radio and television programmes to get that message across?

Mr. Newton: I shall not seek to conceal that information from anybody who wishes to have it. The fact that the hon. Gentleman has raised the point in that way will, I hope, be a helpful additional means of bringing this fact to the attention of those who may be affected.

Another point, which is relevant to the point made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), is that the central heating addition is paid at two rates. The lower rate of central heating addition is the same as the rate of heating addition for all pensioner householders over 65. There is sometimes a tendency to talk about this measure as if all central heating additions were paid at the higher rate rather than the lower, and therefore to assume an effect on pensioners beyond what the facts would sustain.

The other point about central heating additions, on which I would also hope to carry the right hon. Member for Govan and the hon. Member for Birkenhead, is that we have proposed to extend the lower rate of heating addition, which would be worth £2·20 a week from November for all sick and disabled householder claimants on the long-term rate of supplementary benefit. We expect that proposal, which will cost about £1 million—I accept that it is a modest cost—in a full year will benefit about 18,000 claimants.

An indirect effect of the approval of the Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order is that the specified sum—that is, the amount deducted in accordance with section 6 of th Social Security (No. 2) Act 1980 from the supplementary benefit payment payable for the dependants of strikers—will increase automatically at the time of the uprating by 7 per cent. which, rounded down in this case, would take the figure from its present level of £16 to £17 from 25 November.

That change happens automatically unless the Government lay regulations before the House to prevent the automatic application of the primary legislation, and we have decided not to do that. My right hon. Friend will, as usual, make a declaratory order before the effective date simply to put the change on the official record in the normal way.

I move now to the board and lodging regulations and payments under them. The limits on payments for board and lodging do not form part of the regulations before the House, but, when we announced the new limits in March, we undertook to review those limits within a year of their coming into effect in April and to give a further sign of our thinking at the time of the uprating. As the House knows, we have set in hand extensive arrangements for monitoring the operations of the revised board and lodging rules as well as commissioned further research. We hope, by the turn of the year, to have results that will enable us to conduct a comprehensive review of the limits. At the same time, we intend to review the level of the meals allowance for boarders and people of no fixed abode.

The hon. Member for Derby, South asked a parliamentary question today about my next point. We are not uprating the meals allowance in November. That allowance already stands at nearly £30 a week—£29·40 to be precise—which is more than the total benefit available to most non-householders for all purposes and not just for meals. We have had several representations about this anomaly and we think it right to give it further consideration in the context of the board and lodging system as a whole and of the review.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Can my hon. Friend give any comfort or reassurance to a constituent of mine who has written to me about her mother, who suffers from senile dementia, but is in a residential home rather than a nursing home because she does not require nursing? It looks as though she will be hit by the new limits. I understand that my hon. Friend will be reviewing this, but is there any immediate comfort for my constituent or does she have to await the outcome of the review?

Mr. Newton: I may be able to give some immediate comfort, and I shall return to that point in a moment. Before doing so, having referred to the meals allowance, I should also refer to the other half of the question asked by the hon. Member for Derby, South. I have answered her parliamentary question in rather terse terms in expectation of being able to fill out the information that I gave her. We intend to increase in the normal way all the personal allowances within the system. I shall not give the full list in the regulations, but I shall give the main representative examples.

The personal expenses allowance for residents in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes will rise from £8·50 to £8·95 a week. The rate for people on the ordinary rate of benefit in other circumstances who are single will rise from £9·25 to £9·70 a week and the long-term rate for a single person will rise from £10·30 a week to £10·85 a week. The other aspects of the personal expenses allowance, which constitute a list rather more than three times as long as that, will rise in the same way. I hope that the hon. Lady will welcome that.

I return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer). When we referred to our intention of reviewing the limits by April 1986, it was both our expectation and that of the House that it would be appropriate to make changes to the limits, probably in April 1986. Since then, there has been a significant new development in the proposals that we have put before the House in the social security Green Paper which is to change the uprating base, on our current plans, in July 1986. That will make it very difficult and undesirable for us to be conducting changes in the social security system affecting significant numbers of claimants in April 1986 because of the work, on which our officers are already engaged, to carry out the July 1986 uprating.

In those circumstances, we felt it right to consider whether we should make any changes as part of the general uprating of benefits this November, which had not been our original intention. We shall in any case keep these matters under continuing close scrutiny in the light of the monitoring to which I have referred and in the spirit of our willingness, which I have clearly demonstrated in recent weeks, to make appropriate changes in these regulations where the need is shown.

I can tell the House and my hon. Friend that we believe that it would be right, at the time that the uprating takes effect in November, to make some increase in limits for residential care and nursing homes. We intend to increase the limits for all types of residential homes by £10 a week so that the range for these limits will now run from £120 a week to £180 a week instead of from £110 to £170. We also intend to increase the supplement added to these amounts for nursing homes, which at present stands at £28·60 a week, to £50 a week. That means that the limits for nursing homes will be increased by nearly one quarter and will, after November, fall in the range of £170 a week to £230 a week.

We have already provided some scope for greater partnership between my Department and local authorities by allowing local authorities to add in some circumstances to the amounts that they can pay as topping-up provisions in board and lodging payments. Over the next few months, I propose to explore with the local authority associations and others who are concerned whether there is room for building on this beginning by making these arrangements still more flexible, and we shall have particularly in mind the position of people over pension age.

The order that does not run along with the normal social security and housing benefits orders is that concerned with vaccine damage payments. The order will double the amount paid in vaccine damage cases from £10,000 to £20,000 for claims made on or after 18 June. This matter was the subject of some discussion in the House when we debated Lords amendments on the Social Security Bill earlier this week and it was widely welcomed on both sides of the House as a move which improves the position of those unhappy families suffering from these problems. It takes the value of the payment beyond what inflation alone would have required since payments were introduced in 1979. I believe that this improvement will be warmly endorsed by both sides of the House.

Mr. Meacher: We welcome this increase, but there is a great deal of feeling that this method of payment is inadequate and that weekly payments, as is the case in New Zealand, and the Pearson proposals for strict Government liability would be preferable. Will the Government look seriously at those alternatives?

Mr. Newton: I made some comment about this in the debate on Monday and I do not wish to add to what I said. As the hon. Gentleman knows, and as I said on Monday, it is well within the knowledge of hon. Members that the Government have put in hand the largest ever survey of the extent of disablement and its effects with a view to reviewing a wide range of issues, and in particular social security benefits affecting disabled people.

That does not relieve us of looking at the scheme brought forward by the Labour Government in the late 1970s, under which the payment has undoubtedly been eroded by inflation. We are doing something about that problem within the context of existing legislation by amending the Social Security Act, and by bringing forward the regulations to provide for the increase from £10,000 to £20,000 which I have described.

Given the terms on which vaccine damage payments are made, it is virtually certain—I might say certain if I were not such a cautious man at the Dispatch Bax—that any child in respect of whom a vaccine damage payment has been made will automatically qualify for severe disablement allowance, which also operates on an 80 per cent. disablement test when the child reaches the age of 16. There is some controversy about whether weekly payments should be made before that age, but certainly a child who was subject to a vaccine damage payment would be likely automatically to qualify for a weekly payment of benefit on reaching school leaving age. That goes at least some way to meeting the point made by the hon. Gentleman.

The uprating of benefits, which is the main effect of this package, will cost over £2,000 million in a full year. As I have said, not only have we kept our pledge to maintain the value of pensions and linked long-term benefits, but we have also protected from inflation the great majority of other beneficiaries. At the same time, we have managed to direct help to low-income working families who need help most. That is a considerable achievement, and I invite the House to endorse the orders.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): As the Minister said in outlining the broad intention of most elements of what is a farrago of uprating orders, there is no common theme behind today's debate. That does not mean that some important issues in the current development of social policy are not illustrated by these orders. Like the Minister, I want to concentrate on certain of those principles.

The uprating orders deviate substantially from the simple objective of compensating for inflation. The main reason for that is that they are a dry run for the Fowler Green Paper. In several important respects they anticipate and prepare the ground for it, even though that makes a travesty of the whole idea of the consultative process. Under this Government, consultation over social security is something of a sick joke, bearing in mind the number of times the Government have disregarded the advice of their review committees and their Social Security Advisory Committee.

These orders pre-empt the consultative process in at least three significant ways. They increase child benefit by only 2·2 per cent. instead of the full 7 per cent. required to maintain its value. The Green Paper does not specifically state that the real value of child benefit will be cut, but that is the clear implication of paragraph 4(49) which says:

"The Government believe that it will be right to give greater priority to assistance for families in the income range covered by family credit than to the assistance given to families as a whole through child benefit."

The Government are already implementing that policy by raising the family income supplement prescribed limits by between 8·3 and 10·6 per cent. So much for the Green Paper charade. The Government obviously made up their mind on family benefit some time ago. The same applies to housing benefit where the tapers above the needs allowance for rates are to be increased from 9 to 13 per cent. This pre-empts any consideration of the Green Paper proposal in paragraph 3(56) which says:

"the income-related taper for rates should be steeper than underthe current scheme"

The change under today's uprating order more or less exactly meets the Green Paper's aim, because a rate taper of 13 per cent. combined with a rent taper of 29 per cent., which is the current level, will produce a combined total of 42 per cent., and that is on gross income. It is surely hardly a coincidence that that is roughly equivalent to a 70 per cent. taper on net income, which just happens to be the illustrative figure used in the Green Paper.

Another example of this same pre-empting of what is misleadingly called a Green Paper lies in the abolition of the supplementary additions for central heating to which the Minister referred at some length. As the House knows, the Green Paper proposes the abolition of all additional requirements and their replacement by various client group premiums. We know that this is actually being implemented in respect of central heating additions for new claimants with effect from 5 August. In other words, it is being implemented six weeks before the consultation period is completed. So much for the Green Paper. I suggest it is a hard shade of white, and for many thousands of claimants it will be somewhat tinged with black edges.

What is the point of a so-called Green Paper if it is followed not only by a consultation period which is absurdly short, but one which is foreclosed by action taken to implement policy proposals?

Mr. Frank Field: Is it not sensible for the Government to have a short consultation period? After all, they appear unwilling to pay much attention to what we have to say. Surely it would be worse for them to lengthen the process.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend has made explicit what was implicit in my argument. Not only have the Government disregarded in the review exercise their own Social Security Advisory Committee, but they have disregarded the opinions of almost all the pressure groups. A short consultation period extending over two summer months is entirely consistent with that. The Government are not listening to any of the acknowledged experts in the field of social security. Moreover, they are not listening to public opinion, which is more important. Successive opinion polls and a recent Mori poll show that people are not behind the sort of cuts in the Green Paper, and most people want to see the welfare state preserved, even restructured, but not cut back and they want to see an increase in expenditure, particularly in the Health Service.

It is not just a matter of the niceties of consultation, because there is another underlying motive in the Government now pre-empting the Green Paper's objectives and that needs to be brought out. It is that it enables the Government to reduce the losses at the time of changeover in April 1987. By making cuts now of £175 million a year through a lower child benefit uprating, cuts of £38 million by ending new awards of central heating additions, and cuts of £57 million through increasing the rates taken for housing benefit, we have a total cut of £270 million a year. I know that it is offset by about £20 million of increases, but that is a net loss of £250 million.

The Government will announce losses to claimants through the Green Paper changes in April 1987, when they finally get around to doing that, that are much less than they would be otherwise able to claim. That is why the cuts are being made now, although, in all fairness, they should have been included in the overall evaluation of Green Paper cuts, when they finally emerge in 1987.

Another myth surrounding the upratings that must be exposed is the boast, made belligerently by the Secretary of State in his uprating statement on 18 June, that the overall cost of increases in the upratings—£2 billion in a full year—demonstrates the Government's generosity. He was clear about that and belittled me when I suggested otherwise. The fact is that it does nothing of the sort. The Government are doing little more than the bare minimum required by the law on national insurance benefits, or by practice and pledges in the case of supplementary and housing benefits.

The fact that there was leeway for generosity if the Government wished it is revealed by the contrast—I often point out this contrast—with the Budget of 19 March this year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer increased the principal income tax allowances by almost 10 per cent., which was more than double the 4·6 per cent. required by the statutory indexation formula at the time. The cost of increasing the tax thresholds according to that formula would have been about £800 million, yet the Government chose to spend no less than £1·6 billion on them. They did so despite the fact that tax reliefs are indiscriminate, contrary to the Government's repeated insistence that expenditure should be focused on those in greatest need.

The contrast between the Government's willingness to spend on increasing tax thresholds and their reluctance to spend on benefits is especially stark in the case of child benefit. Child benefit was intended to be a replacement for child tax allowances at the end of the 1970s, and was seen as a first step in the introduction of a tax credits scheme, which the Tory party favoured throughout the 1970s. Indeed, in 1975, the present Minister for Health, who held a different portfolio then, said on behalf of the Conservative Opposition in a debate on the Child Benefit Bill that we should have index-linking on precisely those grounds. How bedraggled and miserable that Tory promise on child benefit, so proudly made 10 years ago, looks today.

Another theme runs through the uprating orders. Benefits are uprated according to the barest minimum that is legally required, but deductions in benefits are being increased far faster than any inflation formula could justify. The Minister frowns, but I am sure that he knows what I mean. The 18 per cent. increase in non-dependant deductions is, by any standards, exceptionally severe. The Minister glided over his justification for that extremely quickly. I thought that he was merely telling us that the method by which he communicated it to the House was in accordance with normal custom. He did not seem to defend it.

Mr. Newton: Nothing will stop the flow of the hon. Gentleman's rhetoric, but he suggested that no conceivable uprating basis could underlie the figures. The fact is that they are the measured increases in the retail price index element for housing costs, which was 18 per cent. Similarly, we have uprated heating additions in accordance with the increase in fuel prices; clothing additions by the increase in clothing prices; diet additions by the increase in food prices; and supplementary benefits by the increase in the retail price index, less housing costs. We have uprated the non-dependant deduction and the non-householder housing additions, which are specifically related to housing costs, by the increase in housing costs.

Mr. Meacher: That sounds reasonable until one remembers that the bulk of the increase in housing costs between May 1984 and May 1985 was caused by the huge increase in mortgage rates. During that period, the mortgage interest element of the retail price index increased by no less than 50·8 per cent. I should ask the rhetorical question: how many housing benefit claimants with non-dependants are paying off substantial mortgages? The Government are using an index that is wholly inappropriate and unreasonable and which produces an extremely harsh effect.

Mr. Field: Is not the Minister using some Alice-in-Wonderland logic? He says that housing costs have increased by 18 per cent., but the main effect of changes in housing benefit is to cut the number of people eligible and the amount that they can claim. He turns the argument the other way when it comes to this deduction, saying that the deduction has been increased only by the amount that housing costs have increased. At the same time, he is reducing the amount of money for housing benefit.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend is on to a good point. The Government are trying to have it both ways.

Mr. Newton: While we are talking about people trying to have it both ways, will the hon. Gentleman or the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) give me a reasonably straight and simple answer to the question whether they would apply similar logic to the non-householder housing addition, and whether they would have increased it by less than 18 per cent.?

Mr. Meacher: We are talking about this non-dependant deduction, which has been increased substantially over a short period.

Under the heavily camouflaged title of the Housing Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendment) Regulations 1985, the Government have chopped benefit on the assumption that a working 18-year-old who lives at home with his parents contributes £7·80 a week to rent and £2·60 a week to rates, making a total contribution of no less than £10·40 a week. The DHSS tax benefit models suggest that, in April 1985, typical rent and rates for a married couple with two children were £16·55 a week rent and £8·65 a week rates. That means that the youngster is being asked to contribute almost half of a typical family's housing costs. How can the Minister argue that that is not excessive or unreasonable?

That is not just my view. It is also the view of the Social Security Advisory Committee, which is a quarry of anti-Government material. I hope that that will not give the Minister grounds for abolishing it, because it is an extremely important voice in the wilderness. For the moment, it is a voice coming out of prison, because we are allowed to see its reports. On the increasing of the deduction to £8·20, the SSAC said this:

"We are concerned, however, that these increases have gone beyond what is fair and realistic, and that there will be circumstances in which it is not reasonable to expect the non-dependant to pay a contribution of as much as £8·20. In these conditions the householder either has to bear the increased deduction himself, as a real cut in his own income, or force the non-dependant to leave. Neither may be a realistic option in the actual circumstances of the family, and may indeed work against other aims of social policy, such as the cohesion of the family unit and the better exercise of control by parents over young people. Many representations to us pointed out that if the non-dependant were encouraged to leave home as a result of these changes, the social security costs could well be higher in the long run. It is not possible to quantify this suggested consequence of the proposed changes, but those concerned with dealing with homeless young people report to us that quarrels over finance are a significant cause of young people leaving the parental home."

That is a comprehensive indictment of the Government's policy of rapidly increasing the non-dependant deduction. The rise for 18 to 20-year-olds from the pre-April 1983 period, when it was £3·15 a week, to the time of today's order is no less than 230 per cent., while in the same period inflation was of the order of 10 per cent. As the Social Security Advisory Committee, the Government's own advisory committee, concluded,

"this increase in two years bears no relation either to inflation, to increases in earnings or to increases in housing costs."

In my view, it is simply a way of hammering young people, which seems to be quite an obsession of the Government in many of their policies.

There seems to be a inconsistency, to put it mildly, in the Government's approach to young people. On the one hand, they encourage them to live at home with their parents, for example, by imposing the two, four and eight-week rule on the under-26-year-olds in board and lodging, by proposing a lower rate of income support for the under-25-year-olds in the Green Paper. On the other hand, by imposing very high levels of non-dependant deductions, they make it increasingly difficult for them to do so if their parents are on a low income. Either way, I believe that the deductions bear harshly on young people.

On the main Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1985, I wish to make one major point. It is an extremely important one, I think, which has so far been missed. The two-stage change in the future uprating time scale, to which the Minister referred, from an annual cycle based on November to July 1986 and then to April 1987, has so far been seen, at least by Opposition Members, as a device paving the way for a handout of goodies in the electoral run-up period, as we imagine, in the middle of 1987.

There is another perhaps much more serious issue which I think has not been noted. Under the guise of what is purely an administrative procedure, the Government will cut benefit of nearly 7·5 million single pensioners and nearly 2 million pensioner couples by about £25 million a week. By bringing forward the date on which pensioners get their yearly rise from November 1986 to July 1986, the Government almost certainly will be giving them less, not more. This is because the retail price index has already risen by 4·5 per cent. between January and May 1985. There is nothing unusual about that—it is the normal seasonal sharp rise in prices at the start of the year. If the annual rise in the retail price index turns out to be 4·5 per cent. or thereabouts for the period January 1985 to January 1986—that is certainly the Government's intention and the Chancellor's repeated forecast — it means that pensioners will get nothing, or nearly nothing, because the retail price index will show a nil increase over the period May 1985 to January 1986. That is the period on which the next uprating will be based. I imagine that the Government have noticed that point. I do not think that anyone else has, and in my view it is an important point.

If, on the other hand, the Government left things alone and uprated pensioners' benefits in November 1986, as has been done on a bi-partisan basis over the past 11 years, pensioners might expect to get an increase of around £1·75 a week if they are single and £2·75 a week for a couple. That is the extent to which I believe pensioners will lose by this apparently innocuous bringing forward of the uprating period from November to July.

Mr. Newton: I am interested in the point which the hon. Gentleman makes. It is obvious that any uprating mechanism, over whatever periods are used, related to the rate of inflation will mean that the uprating figures will be affected by changes in the rate of inflation.

Has the hon. Gentleman considered the point that, had we used the Labour Government's uprating formula of operating on forecasts rather than historic figures, it is likely that the uprating in pensioners for which the orders provide in November would be significantly lower than on his analysis? He is really saying no more than that he thinks that the rate of inflation will drop, a comment for which I am grateful in a wider context. If that is the case, the old forecasting method which the Labour Government applied would have produced much lower increases in pensions this November than those contained in the uprating order.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister, perhaps not surprisingly, evades entirely the point that I am making. If I may answer his specific point, it matters not whether one uses the forecasting method or the past record method as long as one is consistent in keeping it year by year, because there are swings and roundabouts. Given that there is an under-expectation of inflation, losses are made up next time around so long as one maintains the 12-month periods. What we are discussing for the first time is the reduction of a 12-month assessment period for the uprating to an eight-month period. That will have significant effects on the next uprating. There will be a once-and-for-all signifaicant loss by pensioners. The Government had better take that point on board, and consider whether they still wish to go ahead with an uprating period which is likely to give pensioners zilch next time.

Mr. Newton: It would obviously be wrong—indeed, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish—to raise unnecessary and misleading fears. The Government have made it clear that the upratings, at whatever time they are carried out—the one we are carrying out with these orders for next November, the one which we propose for July 1986 and the one which we propose for April 1987, and thereafter annually in April—will continue to be based on the historic measurement of the rise in prices. There can be no question but that pensioners will be protected against any rise in prices which takes place. The point at issue is to what extent that rise in prices has occurred in, and is therefore taken into account for, any particular uprating.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister is not answering my point. If there were a 12-month period, what he says would be absolutely correct and, if only the Government would continue to do that, there would be no issue. My point is that the switch from a 12-month to an eight-month period can produce very different results. I am not commenting on whether this is a deliberate device to cheat pensioners of the uprating which they might otherwise get if one kept to the 12-month period. I am saying that it looks as though that will be the result. We all have to take a view on why that is being done. I am not trying to raise fears but, if I am correct that most of the inflation is bunched at the beginning of the year, and one takes the period thereafter as the basis for the assessment period, what I said seems to follow. That will be a substantial disadvantage to 10 million pensioners. The matter should be reconsidered carefully.

Our main contention on this mass of orders is that, behind the genial facade of the uprating, there lurks a series of pitfalls. Wherever the Government are not bound hand and foot by statutory requirement, it seems to some of us that no end of ingenuity has gone into ways of introducing fresh cuts. To give one example, the Minister said that the Government are putting in £26 million. If the Minister refers to Hansard of 15 July this year at columns 63 and 64, he will see that the figure is £23 million, but we will not quarrel about £3 million. If he is putting that amount into improving family income supplement and increasing the housing benefit and child needs allowance, that is fine, but it is dwarfed by the £175 million cut in child benefit. As I said, about 13 per cent. of that cut is being used to assist families in greatest need.

To give another example, the Government are spending an extra £1 million a year, as the Minister mentioned, in extending the lower rate heating addition into sick or disabled person's supplementary benefit. At the same time, they are ending the central heating addition for new claimants which, according to the Government's figures, given on 2 July, will save £55 million by 1988. The word "save", as always, is a euphemism. We are talking about cutting benefits to claimants.

Thirdly, the Government have presented the change in the earnings rule for the wives of invalidity and retirement pensioners as an equal treatment measure between men and women—and indeed it is, to a certain extent. But as in the case of the changes in the immigration rules, it is a levelling down between the sexes rather than a levelling up. It involves cuts in benefit which, according to the Government's figures, will amount to £20 million in 1987-88.

There is to be a change in the housing benefit rates taper which will lead to cuts for more than 2 million households, including 500,000 who will lose entitlement to rate rebates altogether. For that and the big increase in the non-dependent deductions, there is not even any compensating improvement in benefit for the most needy.

While we welcome those parts of the package that will restore protection against inflation, the package is pitted with hidden cuts. I have mentioned only a few tonight. If it is a preview, as I believe it is, of the Green Paper scenario, all that I can promise the Government is that they are in for a long, hot autumn.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I do not want to speak at great length, although the House is not too full, and one might be excused for taking the opportunity to dilate on some of the very important things that underline the decisions contained in these regulations.

I would like, first, to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on something of the greatest importance—the renewing of the Conservative party's commitment to child benefit as the keystone of the family support system.

Mr. Meacher: What?

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: The hon. Gentleman may be surprised by what I have said, but he must be as aware as I am that there is a body of people inside and outside the House who need to be reminded again of the strength of the arguments in favour of child benefit being paid as a universal benefit, rather than targeting assistance to people who might appear to be in the greatest need.

For the most part, the people who have not given the subject of the redistribution of income a great deal of attention feel that child benefit paid universally is somehow wasteful and that it would be better for the money paid to be concentrated on those who come forward through case work and can establish that they have a great immediate need.

However that may be, I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend on the resolute way in which he has presented the case and won the argument in favour of the continuation of universal child benefit. It is a very important matter and an absolutely right decision. He should be congratulated especially by me, because I have taken an active interest in this subject for a very long time. I am delighted with the way in which he has taken up the cause and convinced the party.

I should like, however, somewhat sadly, to comment on the failure to uprate child benefit this year in line with the movement of the economy. Seeing the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) in his place reminds me that on 23 April 1980 he and another hon. Member, who unfortunately is not here tonight, were kind enough to support me when I sought the leave of the House to introduce a 10 minute Bill called the Child Benefit Uprating Bill. The House did not seek to divide and I was given leave to introduce my Bill.

I do not wish to detain the House too long, but the matter is so apposite to what we are discussing now that I would like to read out the brief explanatory memorandum. It states:

"Child benefit was introduced in 1977 to amalgamate in a single payment the family allowance, which was paid from 1946 to 1977, and the child tax allowance, which was introduced in 1799 by William Pitt and was finally phased out for almost all children resident in Britain in 1979.

The objects of the Bill are to raise the amount of child benefit to a figure at which its purchasing power will be broadly equivalent for standard rate taxpayers to the combined value of the two earlier forms of provision for children at the time when the family allowance was first introduced in 1946; and to ensure that its purchasing power does not again fall more than 5 per cent. below that value.

The Bill accordingly stipulates that the rate to be paid shall be raised from November 1980 to not less than £5 per week and that adjustments shall subsequently be made not less than once a year to keep the purchasing power of the benefit in line with retail prices.

In proposing the necessary adjustments to the rate of benefit to be paid from time to time the Secretary of State is required to take account of factors in the composition of the Retail Prices Index which affect its relevance to the particular needs of children."

I do not think that it was a bad Bill. I have not sought to calculate what the figure of £5 in November 1980 would need to be today, but I am sure that it would be more than the uprating to £7 which the House is now considering. If I introduced such a Bill again, I do not think that I would rely for the uprating on the retail prices index. The right index should be the yield of personal taxation, because that is the direct way of assessing the movement of the economy and what the economy is able to bear in the redistribution of income.

I want to make one elementary point. Child benefit is not part of Government expenditure. The Government do not spend the money—it is spent by the parents, usually the mother, of the child. The Government act as agent in the redistribution of income. They take money from people through tax and hand it back through benefits. That is the Government's special function as originally envisaged in the national insurance scheme, which was outside the Treasury in its early days. I am sure that the Treasury did not like that, and it has now more or less absorbed it completely into the Budget. However, the original concept of national insurance was that money was paid in by people at the times when they were able to contribute and drawn out by the same people at the times when they needed it — for example, in the form of pensions, unemployment relief and sickness benefit.

During the life cycle of a citizen, there are times when he puts money into the system and other times when he draws it out. We all welcome the fact that pensioners are entitled to draw money out. However, there is a strange reticence about children drawing out money. Yet they are also citizens and during their life cycle we hope that they will make a valuable contribution to the economy. At times they will be putting much more in than they are taking out. Surely during the life of a child we are considering the time when society should ensure that the child has enough income so that it is properly brought up.

The precise amount of contribution at any one time in the life cycle of a citizen, and the precise amount of benefit that a citizen can take out, are choices for the Government of the day. There is no absolutely right level of benefit or absolutely right level of contribution that one could look at like tablets of stone from Sinai. The Government must make the choice, and they are doing so now.

The right course is to interpret the popular will. What do people want to contribute to national insurance or income tax? What do they think should go back to different categories such as children and pensioners? What should the upratings be so that the Government keep in line with popular feeling while at the same time making the necessary adjustments to adapt to the movement of the economy?

The Government must interpret the popular will, and it is my humble submission that on this occasion my right hon. Friends have it wrong. The public would have preferred child benefit to be increased fully in line with the movement of the economy rather than by the smaller amount to the round figure chosen by my right hon. and hon. Friends. It is a matter on which it is not possible for anyone to pontificate, but I feel that a mistake has been made. I hope that that will be rectified in future years.

Of course, other aspects of the Department's budget must be considered. Within the whole of the outgoings of the Department, a great number of choices must be made, and I know how painful they are for my right hon. and hon. Friends. The House appreciates the attention that Ministers give to getting these matters as right as they can with the resources they have.

Should they have done more this year about raising the selective benefits, which are a sort of emergency service outside the conventional pattern of the redistribution of income, or would it have been better to target their money to the universal benefits? They have chosen the selective benefits and, no doubt, that money will be well spent and competently administered within the limits of the system's capacity to cope with the problems that we have.

However, the selective benefits are not being increased in real terms by the full amount of the cut in child benefit. Thus, the decision to concentrate on the selective benefits does not absorb the full amount of the money that will not be put out in the form of child benefit. We are changing the life-cycle pattern of the average citizen.

What will be the real effect of this decision? It represents a shift from families to childless people in terms of their spending power. Is that a social objective of the Government? I believe that it is not, but that it is an incidental effect that has not been thought through. Although it was not desired initially, it is, nevertheless, a real effect.

When childless people complain that they do not see why they should be made to contribute to other people who choose to have families and bring up children—who say that it is a matter for them if they want to have children — they are neglecting the fact that somebody brought them up when they themselves were children; somebody made a contribution to their upbringing.

When childless people complain that they are asked to pay, by means of tax or national insurance contributions, for the families of other citizens, I feel disposed to ask them, "Who are you bringing up in compensation for the fact that you, in your turn, were brought up by somebody else?" Each generation takes something from the previous one and passes it on to the next, and we all make the contributions that we can or that we feel able to give. I am not sure that I would have chosen childless people as those who should be beneficiaries of the change in Government policy on the redistribution of income.

We also see here a shift from women to men. We recall the debates that we had about abolishing the child tax allowances and amalgamating them with the old family allowance. Family allowances were conventionally drawn by the mother and the child tax allowance was an aspect of the make-up of the pay packet of the man. We had debates, some of them not entirely creditable, in which some Members argued that the wallet was more important than the handbag. The decision was taken; but now the Government are, to some extent, reversing it. I do not regard that as being in accordance with the spirit of the times and I hope that further thought will be given to that aspect of the matter.

From the administrative point of view, we are seeing more emphasis on individual casework and less reliance on automatic computer credits. The child benefit is an automatic credit. It is a benefit which enjoys an extremely high rate of take-up. There is no humiliation to people in drawing the universal child benefit; but there is inevitably a degree of reluctance on the part of citizens — an element of humiliation and elements of distaste — in drawing a benefit which relies on proof of need through casework.

From answers to parliamentary questions I elicited the fact not long ago that, in the administration of national insurance and supplementary benefit, the Department is required to make more than 90 million manual entries every week. That is the administrative burden that is now carried by the loyal and wonderfully reliable and long-suffering staff of the Department of Health and Social Security. In that the Government are relying increasingly on casework and less on the use of computer and automatic benefits, they are adding to the millions of entries that must be made, and that is a mistake.

We have many times debated the whole subject of selective and universal benefits. One must remember, because the logic of the argument leaves one with no choice, that if the Government rely on universal benefits, they unite the nation and eliminate administrative work. But if they rely on means-tested benefits, they introduce into the redistribution of income two highly undesirable elements.

A large number of people learn the hard way that there is no purpose in thrift because they must run their savings down—I appreciate that there is an allowance, that it is not ungenerous and that it is being increased—before being eligible for benefit. If they save a large sum of money, they rule themselves out of benefit. That must for many people be an argument against thrift.

More than 8 million people in Britain today are dependent on supplementary benefit. That means that 8 million people are learning the hard way that an aspect which is central to the tenets of the policy of the present Government—which is widely supported and which is part of the British tradition of common sense, namely, the importance of self-reliance and thrift—does not apply to them.

Further, they are not always the same 8 million people whom we carry with us as second-rate citizens. People go in and out of reliance on supplementary benefit from time to time, so that between one election and another the number of people who have learnt that what the Government say about the importance of thrift does not apply to them may be as many as 10 million, or even more.

There is also the problem of the disincentive to work, which the Government are seeking to diminish by their brilliant suggestions for the reform of the redistribution of income. However, when all is said and done, if we rely on giving benefit only to those on very low incomes and withdraw their capacity to draw benefit as they increase their incomes, we undermine their incentive to work. We can dress that up in different ways and try various methods to encourage them to work, notwithstanding the logic of that underlying fact. Nevertheless, selective benefits undermine the will to work, and that is a fundamental argument against them.

In spite of what I have said, I congratulate the Government on their decision that universal child benefit shall remain the keystone of our family support. Christian democrats in all parts of the House can rejoice in that.

I have one suggestion, which I hope the Minister will consider to be constructive. Because a number of people feel that it is wrong for them to draw child benefit because they do not strictly need it, the Government may consider the possibility—I have mentioned it in the House before —that such people could be allowed to renounce the child benefit and let it remain the child's money. It could accumulate in a special account, such as a national savings account, and be indexed to cater for changes in the value of money. After reaching a particular age—say 18—the child would be entitled to a lump sum which would be the rolled-up full amount, with compound interest, of the child benefit to which that child was entitled from the start.

Many parents might think that an endowment of, say, £10,000 which had been saved for the child by that means, would be an attractive family credit. Instead of drawing the money each week, when they feel that they do not strictly need it, they could sign a form of renunciation which would allow that money to accumulate on the child's behalf until, say, the age of 18, being a form of child endownment giving a capital sum instead of a weekly allowance.

I hope that the Minister will consider that possibility. It would meet the case of people who feel a certain distaste, perhaps an unnatural shame, about drawing their child's benefit. It would give them another option.

7.30 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am always pleased to be able to take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I feel that I am better informed for listening to his speeches. Of course, I do not always agree with what he has to say, but I appreciate his experience and assiduous work on these matters. I am pleased to say that I agreed with many of his comments, especially those directed to child benefit. Perhaps his effusive congratulations to the Government on the way in which they have maintained child benefit as the keystone of their policy when they have failed to increase the benefit sufficiently to keep it in line with inflation could be described as incongruous, but I agreed with the majority of his speech and he advanced his case extremely well.

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

Last weekend I canvassed the views of the man in the street, as it were, in my constituency. I included especially the elderly. I sought my constituents' views on the upratings that we are now discussing.

Mr. Field: The anti-women industry.

Mr. Kirkwood: I stand corrected. I carried out my canvass in what might be described as small Scottish rural towns and I accept that it might not have produced an average and typical sample. However, it appears that there is a wide gulf between their perception of the opportunities and standard of living that are available to them and that of the Government. I deployed to the best of my ability the case that the Government are presenting, which it is possible to do statistically. The reaction of those to whom I spoke was to ask, "What about the top salary pay review and the awards? It is all very well to say that £2,000 million has been spent on the uprating but what about the Secretary to the Cabinet, whose salary is to be increased from £50,000 to £75,000 per annum?"

Retired people, especially those on small occupational pensions, complained bitterly that their pension income is taxed. They stressed that they have been waiting for a long time for the Government to change the earnings rule. The Government have promised that they will do so as soon as they feel that they can afford to change the rule but they have been promising change for a long time. Other complaints were directed to dental charges, the service provided by opticians and the limited list of drugs available to doctors for prescriptions, although some of the complaints about the list have been met. However, there remains a great deal of heartache, confusion and concern in the high street of Hawick and other places in my constituency.

One can say until one is blue in the face that the uprating reflects the movement of the retail price index but the response of the average person is to argue that a 1 per cent. increase in the RPI is not reflected exactly in price increases in the shops and that a tin of corned beef which costs 65p moves up to 75p in the space of a week although the RPI has reflected only a 1 per cent. movement. One lady told me that she had calculated that her shopping costs over the past two years had escalated by 33·3 per cent.

Many of my constituents cannot understand why they are faced with standing charges for their gas, electricity and telephones. They read in their newspapers that the fuel industries are, by and large, making huge profits in terms of money, which they understand, yet sometimes standing charges amount to as much as the units that they have consumed. The Government are doing nothing to reduce standing charges and in some instances are imposing levies on the fuel industries which bear adversely on some of the poorest in our society. The argument applies to television licences, but to a lesser extent. There is concern also about the death grant, and the Government's proposals would serve only to make the position worse. I received complaints also about the Government's failure to increase the Christmas bonus to a proper level in line with inflation.

It seems that there is a wide gulf of misunderstanding. If the Government have a better case to put to the public, I suggest strongly that they get out into the highways and byways and present it to the people. They should make a better job of their PR if they think that they can do so.

There is a gap between those receiving benefits and pensions, which are based on the retail price index, and increases in average earnings, which are based on another scale. How is the discrepancy to be approached in future? Do the Government recognise the justice or the merit in increasing benefits and pensions in excess of what is statutorily required to try to redress the balance? If they say that they are not prepared to accept that recommendation of the Social Security Advisory Committee, it is inevitable that pensioners and those in receipt of benefits will fall further and further behind wage earners.

I agree with the hon. Member for Kensington that there is a shift in Government policy in favour of childless couples. If that is the fact, it should be stated explicitly and debated. Like the hon. Gentleman, I feel that it is the wrong way in which to move. The move to diminish the importance of child benefit to the extent of £175 million discriminates actively and positively against women, which is deeply to be regretted. Some of the pressure groups feel that the process of consultation that the Green Paper is supposed to stimulate is being stymied and fudged by some of the changes that the Government propose or which have been made, especially in relation to child benefit.

The Government might have been able to persuade me that the cut in child benefit was defensible if they were able to be more convincing in the provision that they have made for other benefits, especially family income supplement. I might have been persuaded by the Government's case if the cut in child benefit of £175 million had been diverted to the family income supplement mechanism, or to a far larger extent. The Minister has said that £26 million has been ploughed back into FIS as opposed to the £175 million that has been removed from child benefit. Unfortunately, the proposals for FIS do not go anything like far enough to enable me to support the cut in child benefit. The Child Poverty Action Group suggests that if the Government are determined to proceed with the £175 million cut, they should consider introducing a child benefit premium for low income families. That suggestion should certainly be considered during the consultation period.

The CPAG has argued—it has persuaded me—that the FIS system reaches only a small minority of low income working households with children. Its briefing paper states:

"The analysis of low incomes in Vol. 3 of the Green Paper shows that about 700,000 families with children headed by a wage-earner were in the bottom fifth of incomes (the definition of low income used) in 1982. The number is likely to be even higher today. FIS is currently received by only about 200,000 families (and was received by only 158,000 in 1982). Similarly, DHSS figures show that, in 1981, over one-and-three-quarter million children were being raised in working families living in poverty or on its margins (up to 40 per cent. above SB level). FIS is currently received on behalf of only 417,000 children."

There is evidence that FIS does not go far enough, and the Government have missed an opportunity to extend that cover.

Child benefit is an important part of the budget of the low paid. Again, the CPAG reported the analysis of the social policy research unit at York university, and concluded:

"child benefit clearly plays an important role . . . Low income families not in receipt of supplementary benefit received about a fifth of their net disposable incomes from child benefit, rising to about a quarter for lone parent families if one-parent benefits is also included . . . These results suggest low income families would lose a substantial proportion of their income if their entitlement to child benefit was in any way reduced."

That is true. The case has been incontrovertibly made. The Government have made a mistake, and the hon. Member for Kensington was right in saying that the popular will was contrary to the Government's will. The man in the street was surprised to find the extent of the Government's proposed cut. Given the Green Paper reviews and the ongoing consultation process, the future does not augur particularly well for low-income families. The work done by the Institute for Fiscal Studies is evidence of that. It studied the impact of some of the proposals on one-parent families, and one-earner couples with a variety of family complexions, and concluded that low earners, low income families and single parent families would bear the brunt.

I am worried about the central heating addition changes. Their introduction cannot be justified. The £1 million extension to the disabled and the sick is obviously a welcome development, as all sides of the House will recognise. However, the complexity of the system that remains will cause tremendous confusion. The present dual test identifies those who are sick and disabled and who live in difficult-to-heat accommodation. Whereas previously people in that category could double up those two conditions and receive a higher rate of benefit, the proposal will remove that possibility. The Government should consider restoring the possibility of receiving the higher level of benefit, if the difficult-to-heat accommodation test is also met.

There has been considerable trouble in my constituency with the difficult-to-heat estate rates. The Government should reconsider that, and introduce proposals to allow people to apply for and claim that rate of benefit, if the central heating equipment was installed after the estate was built. I have personal experience of the tremendous difficulties that that causes.

I cannot understand why the Government have chosen 5 August to introduce the change in the central heating additions. It may be a deeply significant date. It would have been much more sensible to use the November uprating date so that we had more time to publicise the cut. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) rightly pointed out, people who do not apply between now and August will forgo the benefit, and that is unfair.

If the Government are acting in good faith on the central heating addition, during the consultation period they should spend money on a widespread campaign for take-up of benefit so that we have a true measure of the cost of benefit. It could be easily done by giving local offices the power and resources to campaign in the local press, and on local radio and television stations. That would satisfy me to a greater extent that the Government were approaching the review in a more open-minded and fair-handed way.

The staff resources of the Department must be stretched to the limit by the proposals for next year. The concertinaed process of the upratings, on top of the development work on some of the changes, especially in housing benefit, will put an intolerable pressure on some of the front line staff. I do not mean the mandarins in Whitehall but people such as those in my local integrated office. By and large they do a good job in impossible circumstances. I hope that the Government are considering them, as well as policy points and other problems.

It would be churlish not to recognise that the Minister's announcement on board and lodgings allowances for residential increases in nursing homes must be warmly welcomed. The Minister responded quickly, and I certainly did not expect the announcement so soon. It shows that he has been paying attention to what has been going on. The increases will be warmly welcomed, and that is a good point on which to end.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I was intrigued to hear that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) spent last weekend meandering through his constituency, and setting on unsuspecting constituents to ask their views. He shows a political talent which most of us lack. Perhaps he was more aware than the Government Whips of how close Wednesday's vote would be and how near the possibility of a general election we were. His local paper will undoubtedly pick up his diligence in gaining constituents' views.

I was also interested to learn that the hon. Gentleman discovered his constituents' concern about the Top Salaries Review Body award. It is interesting that in the early hours of Wednesday morning, when we discussed top people's pay, the Chamber was so crowded that hon. Members were almost swinging from the balconies, and that today, when we discuss bottom people's pay, far fewer hon. Members are present in the Chamber. I cannot quite understand why.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has left the Chamber, because I wish to comment on some of his remarks. He has obviously taken comments on the need to consult constituents to heart. At this moment he is probably tearing back to Kensington to hear his constituents' views. He skilfully plunged the stiletto knife into the Government by gently congratulating them on their child benefit decisions. He was really saying —if he were not such a gentleman he would have put it in my terms — that if we did not have a Government whose protection of the family was so awful, we would be debating, not cuts in child benefit but increases, and we congratulate the Government only on the new status quo that they are creating because the position could have been much worse. Child benefit could have been means-tested. The Government could have paid attention to their supporters and abolished it completely. It is appropriate that the hon. Member for Kensington should comment on child benefit, because for a long time he was the lone voice trying to educate the House and the country about its importance.

The change of view on child benefit and family support owes a great deal to the work of the hon. Member for Kensington. Back Benchers can be influential if they stick through thick and thin to a few topics. I welcome the hon. Gentleman back to the Chamber. It is appropriate that I said the nice things about him while he was out of the Chamber. I can now refer to some points of disagreement.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who is the main champion of child benefit in this House, will not again end his speech in the way that he did this evening, by saying that some parents feel a certain amount of guilt about drawing child benefit. If guilt exists, it has to be challenged, because it is a benefit that goes to all families as of right. I hope that we would not limit any reform to those parents who at any time feel that they are so well off that they do not need to claim child benefit.

[Mr. Frank Field]

I hope that the next Labour Government—we all live in hope—will be far more radical and follow the path of the New Zealand Government, and not only in regard to the abolition of tax benefits. For a considerable time the New Zealand Government have allowed mothers to choose whether they wish to capitalise part of their child benefit payments. If we are serious about extending home ownership and the ownership of capital goods in the community, this House and the electorate should think seriously about giving people the chance to have a capital sum in lieu of child benefit payments, rather than adopting the much more modest proposal made by the hon. Gentleman. He seemed to suggest that some people feel some guilt about claiming child benefit and that they should be allowed to build up a capital sum for their children. I should much prefer that capitalisation to occur for the family now, rather than that children of well-to-do families should pick up the value of child benefit at 18, or whatever age was chosen.

I should like now to refer to the comments of the Minister for Social Security in his opening speech. Opposition Members were trying to establish that there has been a major change in attitude towards child benefit on the part of the Government, whereas the Minister was claiming that nothing of the kind had occurred. He was saying that at each review the Government have to make a judgment about whether to increase child benefit. That is a major change from the position that was outlined before the uprating statement.

I need to take the House back to the time of the last Labour Government. They were wrongly maligned on many issues but rightly on their initial attitude to child benefit. The House will remember that the Labour party gave an election pledge to introduce child benefit by merging the family allowance system and child tax allowances. Then some northern Members talked over the weekend to their constituents—I warn the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire that it is dangerous to talk too much to one's constituents—who were horrified to find that the Government were proposing a reform which would transfer income from men to women. The Government panicked. Initially they said that the scheme would not be introduced but, as a result of the leaking of Cabinet papers, they were forced to introduce the scheme.

The then official Opposition rightly exploited the embarrassment of the then Labour Government. One of the means of exploiting that embarrassment was the tabling of early-day motions. Early-day motion 420 was tabled on 12 July 1977. One of the signatories to an amendment to that motion was the present Minister for Social Security. It called on Her Majesty's Government "to ensure that increases in child benefit are treated in the same way as tax cuts, so that . . . there can be an improvement in the real value of child benefit as part of an overall reduction in the burden of direct taxation and a shift to indirect taxation".

I emphasise that the operative words talked about

"an improvement in the real value of child benefit" and not the cut with which we are faced today. The signatories also wished to see "a shift in indirect taxation".

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) received a letter from the Prime Minister during the general election campaign of 1983, and her reference in that letter to child benefit came in two parts. They are important and relevant to our debate. First, the Prime Minister said:

"Child support has also been fully protected under the Conservative Government; allowing for the new rate announced at the time of the Budget, which came into payment this November, there has been an increase since April 1979 of over 62 per cent. in the level of child benefit. This would put Child Benefit at its highest ever real value."

It was absolutely correct and right for the Government to make that claim. If tonight's orders are passed, the Prime Minister will not be able to make that case to any hon. Member or to any constituent, because we are now talking about cuts in child benefit.

In her letter, the Prime Minister rightly went on to refer to the achievements of her Government when she said:

"The importance the Government attaches to Child Benefits was made clear by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech in March this year, when he said: 'It is important for families and particularly for the low paid. Indeed it is the benefit which provides the greatest help for many of the poorest families in the country'".

I emphasise the crucial importance of the statement about the importance of child benefit for families and for the low paid, and that it is of the greatest help to many of the poorest families in the country. Her letter illustrates the significance of the change that we are debating tonight.

Until the introduction of the order, the Government could claim that the Conservative party was the party of the family. The Government will not be able to make that claim in the next general election because tonight, for the first time under this Government, we are seeing a reversal of the policy of clear commitment to view increases in child benefit in the same way as reductions in taxation. Before the order, there was no talk of increasing FIS or of introducing a new social credit. The Government maintained that the benefit was crucial to all families and to all women, and of particular importance to the low paid.

I should like now to refer to the points made by the hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and for Kensington. We know that the Government will save £175 million from the cut in child benefit. We were fobbed off by the Minister for Social Security when we intervened in his speech. We have a right to ask him whether the Government will give us an assurance that the whole £175 million will go into the new social credit. The Government cannot claim that the cut is being made as a means of targeting help on the poorest families unless that assurance is forthcoming. The hon. Member for Kensington said —he has a delicate way of putting a stiletto into the Government's side — that if we do not get that commitment, the Government will be using much, if not most, of the saving not to help poor families but to help finance tax cuts for all taxpayers, the majority of taxpayers being those without children. Therefore, we shall be seeing a redistribution from families to single people.

I end, as the hon. Member for Kensington ended, by reminding the Government—because I am less gentle than the hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Government do not need to be re-educated about the importance of child benefit—that it is not only a way of maintaining tax equity between people with children and those without children. We must all reiterate the new argument advanced by the hon. Member for Kensington that it also ensures that thrift is not penalised because there is nothing in the rules of paying child benefit which will penalise those who save and those who have capital. It also concentrates help on the very poorest people in the sense that child benefit is a larger part of their incomes than it is of the incomes of other families. It is the best way of tackling the incentive to work problem and, as both the hon. Member for Kensington and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) reminded the House, it is the most effective way of transferring resources to women.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will be more forthcoming about this issue than the Minister has been. The Opposition are putting forward the view that there has been a fundamental shift in Government policy from a commitment without qualification to child benefit to a limited commitment to it. That has profound repercussions, in the way that other hon. Members have described.

I want also to comment on two other issues raised in the orders. The first relates to central heating additions and the second to the changes in housing benefit.

The Government must be given credit. They are highly skilled in presenting these changes. If private industry paid attention to our debates, it would set head hunters to work to discover who it was in the DHSS who had this extraordinary skill of presenting quite significant cuts as a way of providing extra help for the poorest of our fellow citizens.

We see it in the heating additions. The Government say that they are making an automatic benefit for the sick, the disabled and the blind who are on the long-term rate of supplementary benefit and do not have to register for work. The Government say that they will get the benefit automatically. At the same time, after 5 August, the Government are to abolish the heating addition for central heating.

It is a clever move. From the answers to parliamentary questions by the Under-Secretary, we discover that the automatic benefits will cost £1 million in a full year but that the cuts in central heating additions will total £55 million. The message goes out to our constituents that, on average, 510 of them will lose this benefit unless they claim before 5 August. We have 10 days in which to tell large numbers of people who currently are eligible for central heating additions that they should claim.

I tremble for the future of our social security system when I consider the reason that the Government put forward for the cuts. It is that they are alarmed at the numbers of people claiming. It has been a success. The Government have targeted help to it. Our constituents have claimed. Then the Government say that so many people are claiming it that it had better be withdrawn quickly. It means that we are caught in the Government's own benefit trap.

Benefits are secure under this Government only if large numbers of our constituents do not claim them. Once they start to claim, the chances are that the Government will suggest that the expenditure is getting out of control and that cuts must be made.

I congratulate the Government on the cleverness of that DHSS official who has managed to present yet another important cut as an increase in benefit rights for some of our poorest constituents.

As for the changes in housing benefits, even the cleverness of that official in the DHSS has not been able to disguise the extent of the cuts both in the rates taper and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, in the changes in the non-dependant deductions.

Under these changes, overall about 2 million claimants will lose some benefit, 460,000 will lose all help with their rates and an additional 340,000 will lose all housing benefit. It means that about 800 of the constituents of each hon. Member will lose all help with their rate payments, about 550 will lose all help with housing benefit and, in total, between 3,500 and 3,600 of our constituents will suffer cuts in their living standards as a result of this move to change the rates taper. If that is not enough, we see further cuts in these very important changes in the non-dependant deductions that many poorer households will face.

The Government make these proposals without any real understanding of the tension caused in low-income families. Many mothers know what a strain it is to bring up children in a poor household. There is a sense of continual failure that they have never managed to give their children what other children have. They are anxious that when their children cease schooling and, if they are lucky enough, find jobs or draw benefit, they have money in their own right with which to buy clothes, just as their peers at school or at work have always had. For the Government to say that, at the point where there is extra income coming into a household, for the first time they will claw it back shows a real lack of imagination. If it is not a lack of imagination, it demonstrates a degree of cruelty which even this Government have not shown until now.

There is much in the orders that the Opposition welcome. There are the changes for disabled people which all hon. Members will welcome. There are the changes for our very sick constituents in nursing homes. That is especially welcome and it is a very generous move on the part of the Government. However, necessarily I have concentrated on the cuts in the heating additions and above all in child benefit. There has been a sea change. Until this order, the Government could claim that they had a good record in being the party of the family. They made much of that. In 1979, the Government claimed to be that party. In 1983, they rightly claimed that their record justified that assertion. They will not be able to go into the next general election with that claim intact.

8.8 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): We have had an interesting and wide-ranging debate. I shall endeavour not to cover the same ground so ably covered already by those hon. Members who have contributed.

I begin where my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) left off. We were talking about the change in the uprating date, and my hon. Friend said that this might have unfortunate implications, for example, for pensioners, and he wondered whether this was a way for the Government to save money or just what their intention was.

I have a nastier mind than my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. I wonder whether the Government have in mind that, because the inflation figures will be rather lower than normal when these changes are being considered, they will be able to tell pensioners that they are not entitled to anything because inflation has been kept low and there is little need to give them very much. However, they will add that, out of the generosity of their heart, they intend to put in an extra 1 or 2 per cent. over and above the rate of inflation. That is much more in line not only with what my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mrs. Margaret Beckett]

Birkenhead (Mr. Field), with his customary charity described as skill but with the boldness, if not the barefaced cheek, that the Government usually show in advocating their policies. It would also be much more in line with the Government giving pensioners an increase similar to that which they would normally receive at the date of the usual uprating and claiming credit for it being over and above the rate of inflation, and with the election-winning strategy that the Government are attempting to pursue.

Hon. Members have spoken about the Government's change of policy towards child benefit and family income supplement and the way that that represents a shift away from assistance for families. I listened, as always, with interest and admiration to the remarks of the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I do not always have the same degree of admiration when I listen to those who say how hard it is for them to bring themselves to claim child benefit, especially, as is sometimes the case in the House, when those same people use the fact that they hate claiming child benefit as a justification for its ceasing to be a universal benefit. The result would be that hon. Members and a whole range of other people who are not so well paid would lose the advantage of child benefit.

The hon. Gentleman said that there might be some way in which people could change the use of child benefit. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead made some suggestions. I have never understood why those people who so dislike child benefit do not make a convenant and transfer the money to a charity or a group of poor people about whom they are worried. I trust that the next time a change in the universal nature of child benefit is advocated those people who say that they should not be drawing it will have seen that it has gone to those in greater need.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I should not like to say that I disagree with the hon. Lady's attitude, because I believe that there is a good deal of humbug amongst those people who are well off enough to raise a child without this form of tax cut. Child benefit is a tax cut. A benefit and a tax cut are the same. In suggesting that a way should be found to turn the benefit into capital for the child, I am seeking also to emphasise that the money is the child's and not that of the parents. The parents should not think that they are drawing it for themselves. They draw it because they have a responsibility for the child, and they should spend it on the child. In those cases—not many—where mothers are blamed for not spending it on the child, it should be drawn to their notice that that is the purpose of child benefit.

Mrs. Beckett: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I do not altogether disagree with him. In a sense, we accept that child benefit is a benefit for the child. The fact that those who draw it have no need of it is often used as an argument for child benefit not to be universal. I have never understood why such people do not take steps to give it to those for whom they usually express anxiety instead of seeking to reduce the scope of the benefit for those who may need it more.

Although families may benefit from the increase in family income supplement, they are liable to lose through some of the changes in child benefit and housing benefit. That means that they are not being treated as generously as the Government sometimes claim.

We wholeheartedly welcome the change being made in line with the pledge given by the Minister of State about the payment of funeral costs for people engaged in disputes, and the changes and the substantial increase in payments to those who have suffered vaccine damage.

We were sorry the other day to hear the Minister say that that change does not necessarily mean that there will be an increase each year in line with inflation, but we hope now that the Government have taken powers to make that increase that it will not be seven years before the next increase—even if it is not every year. I know that the Minister said that the changes did not preclude the introduction of a more wide-ranging scheme for those who have suffered vaccine damage and others, but we hope that that is not a sign that the Government have no plans to introduce better schemes.

The Government should draw to the attention of those who might be able to claim the central heating addition the fact that they are liable to lose it. The Government should seek out those who have wrongly suffered a voluntary unemployment deduction. The Minister will be aware that his Department has recently been absolved from the duty to make the payment to those people, but we hope, nevertheless, that the Department will consider undertaking a further campaign to draw that loss to their attention. I hope that he will give an undertaking that in the meantime the Department will not destroy the files so that there is no record of those who may be able to claim such deductions were they aware of the extent to which they have been deprived.

The Minister mentioned the regulations which we have become accustomed to call the board and lodging regulations. We welcome the improvement that the Minister has announced. It is fair to say that the Government were warned consistently, when they introduced the temporary regulations and when they introduced the present regulations, that the limits set were inadequate. We are glad that they have decided to make an increase from November and to make the limits available to those in nursing homes. It was extraordinary that people in such homes were entitled only to claim something like the attendance allowance above the limits available for residential care homes.

Although we welcome what the Minister said about residential care homes and nursing homes, there is one aspect of what he said which caused me anxiety. I hope that when the Under-Secretary replies he will answer my questions. The Minister for Social Security said that he felt that the change in the date of uprating from now until July 1986 meant too long a wait for an alteration of that magnitude which would therefore be made in November. He did not, however, announce any increase in the limit for the under-26-year-olds who are also affected by the regulations. I wonder whether the implication of what the Minister said is that we shall have to wait until July 1986 for an increase in those limits. That would be a serious matter.

We are at the beginning of the period when people in major cities, especially London, will be affected by the limits and the other changes in the board and lodging regulations. There will be increasing protest about the inadequacy of those limits, for example, in London. If we are not to see any change in those limits for a year—as may be inferred from the Minister's statement — the Government are in danger of making an already bad position a great deal worse. I shall say no more about the structure of those regulations, on which we have strong views, because I am sure that we shall return to the subject. I am anxious to have an answer from the Minister on that point.

I welcomed what the Minister for Social Security said about the increases in other allowances, although I wondered—I shall not press the Under-Secretary on this point — whether he was implying that the meals allowance might be reviewed down. I hope that I was mistaken in drawing that inference, but we shall watch that point carefully. If that were to be the case, it would add insult to injury and greatly exacerbate what is already a difficult and, for many youngsters, a disastrous position.

I intend to deal with housing benefit and central heating additions together. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead, with his usual skill, drew the Government's attention to the fact that they are acting strangely if one accepts their description of the course on which they claim to be embarked.

In terms of the entire housing benefits scheme, we have seen how the Government first substantially cut the money available for general housing subsidies by £1,300 million since 1979. They then actively encouraged increases in rents that were bound to follow by cutting such a fantastically large sum from the general housing subsidy. When those rents increases meant that many more individuals were eligible for housing benefit, the Government said that too many people were claiming it, and, having targeted spending in the first place, they used that targeting as an excuse for later cuts. We strongly suspect that we shall be seeing that on a much greater scale later.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead pointed out, the only reasons so far advanced by the Government for making the change in central heating additions—unless the Minister comes forward with a fresh reason tonight—is precisely that too many people are claiming them. That was also the reason for the Government's proposals on board and lodging regulations. It is all very well to have such regulations, but the problem seems to arise when people are so inconsiderate as to wish to draw these benefits.

The Government have deliberately imposed extra taxes on fuel and have deliberately raised fuel costs. It is therefore extraordinary that they should be cutting heating additions. I understand that many people, particularly those who draw the higher rate additions, are unemployed. It is particularly unfortunate that, in line with the Government's general attitude to the unemployed—and their proposal that such people be on the lowest rate of income support in the scheme that will be put to us in the next parliamentary Session — they are again cutting central heating additions to the unemployed.

The Minister of State said that central heating additions used to be higher because the costs of central heating were considered to be above the costs of heating in general. It was pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) that that could well be because at this time of year many people did not have their central heating switched on. My constituency case work convinces me that my right hon. Friend is quite correct.

But let us set aside the reality of how people live and accept the Government's argument. The Minister appears to be saying that it was fine to have a central heating addition when costs were above general costs, but now that they are not so far above, or perhaps even below, general heating costs, the money is taken away altogether instead of being switched to improve general heating additions. That is a strange argument, and it is perhaps another example of the ingenuity to which my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead referred when he spoke of the Government justifying the various cuts and changes that they have made.

Mr. Newton: I hope that the hon. Lady recognises that, leaving aside heating additions, the supplementary benefit rates include a basic element for heating costs. The justification for the existence of the heating addition is that the types of property involved carry with them heating costs over and above the norm. That seems to destroy the hon. Lady's argument.

Mrs. Beckett: I understand the Minister's second point, but, as I have already said, the Government's own actions have substantially raised the cost of fuel.

The Minister is always telling us that this Government feel that they have a much better record than previous Governments. If he feels that the notional element in supplementary benefit rates for heating costs is sufficient, we would be more than happy if he gave an order of magnitude as to what exactly that element is. We would then be able to judge how near that comes to meeting the fuel costs of claimants.

We should like to hear that the Government intend to keep the higher rate of addition for those who will still qualify. I understand that at present only about 4 per cent. of claimants would qualify. But those who are fortunate enough to quality under the Government's new scheme should at least get the higher rate of addition, particularly as they could lose out if in the past they were entitled to two additions but did not claim the one that is being preserved.

The Government ought to consider extending the estate rate addition to estates in which central heating systems were installed after the estate was built rather than at the same time. That is an unquestioned loophole in the regulations, and, having made fairly substantial savings elsewhere, the Government should well be able to afford such an extension.

Over the last few years there have been substantial cuts in housing benefit—far above what could possibly be justified. In 1983, 400,000 people lost entitlement altogether, and 1·75 million lost some benefit in order to provide a cut of about £50 million. In 1984, when there was a cut of £215 million, 500,000 people lost entitlement altogether, and about 1·75 million lost at least some housing benefit entitlement. The Government are now embarking on another round of cuts of about £500 million. We can therefore expect substantial additional numbers of people to lose out.

Apart from the general cuts in the housing benefits scheme, there are specific proposals that come within the ambit of the changes that we are now discussing. Has the Minister been able to discover or invent any justification for the cut in subsidy to local authorities to 80 per cent.? In the past, the subsidy that was received was generally of about 100 per cent. When we last discussed housing benefit, this appeared to be a wholly arbitrary figure. There seemed to be no particular reason why the rate should have been set at 80 per cent. There appeared to be no reason for saving that money. If the Government have now managed to come up with a reason, we would be interested to know of it.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Has the Minister any better reason for taking away altogether the subsidy that local authorities are receiving for administration? At present it is about 60 per cent. of costs. We were told that it would provide a greater incentive to contain costs and improve efficiency, but this is at a time when the Government intend substantially to increase the costs and difficulties faced by local authorities, as well as the number of defaults they are likely to face, by the proposal under which everyone will have to pay 20 per cent. of the rates.

We are also discussing the increases in tapers that the Government will be putting forward. I understand that over the past two years the Government have effectively doubled the rate taper. There are now to be further substantial changes. Not only will that affect hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people, but it will save the Government substantial sums. I sometimes wonder whether the Government appreciate the effect of this on the incomes of those from whom they keep making what they regard as comparatively minor savings.

There has recently been evidence from the Low Pay Unit about the amount of household income left for those with incomes at the highest levels at which housing benefit is still paid. We understand that the Government are seeking to reduce those levels, and the Government constantly complain that housing benefit is paid too far up the income scale. But, as we constantly remind them, it is not paid to anyone who is even near average earnings unless that person's rent is above average.

Using the data from the family expenditure survey, in evidence to the Government's housing benefit review the unit pointed out that, after expenditure on essentials, such as food, fuel, clothing and housing, the kind of households that are able to draw housing benefit are left with about £2.50 to £3.50 a day. It also drew attention to the items that those sums of money have to cover: laundry, shoe repairs, transport other than to work, toilet requisites, the prescription charges that the Government have substantially increased and such minor costs as children's pocket money and toys. Nevertheless, these are very important items of expenditure, particularly for poorer families. Therefore, it is unwise for the Government to continue cutting away at housing benefit, thinking only of the public expenditure consequences and not appreciating the effects that the cuts are having upon the standard of living of so many families.

This is applicable in particular to non-dependant deductions. My hon. Friends have made most of the points that I would otherwise have made, but I think that we ought also mildly to rebuke the Under-Secretary of State for his statement on 27 June that nobody on supplementary benefit would be affected by the Government's proposed changes to housing benefit. The Minister for Social Security said that it is unusual to announce the increases in non-dependant deductions with the upratings, so perhaps they had slipped the mind of the Under-Secretary of State. However, they certainly affect those on supplementary benefit and from that point of view alone ought perhaps to have been drawn to our attention.

The Minister for Social Security said that the index which has been consistently used for non-dependant deductions is 18 per cent. He implied that this increase has been used for many years. Will the Under-Secretary of State tell us whether the major increase in non-dependant deductions in April 1984 — an increase which was roundly condemned as wholly unreasonable by the Social Security Advisory Committee — was made purely because of the increase in the housing cost index? If so, it is surprising that the Government gave no reason for an increase which at the time was so widely and extensively condemned.

About 400,000 families will be affected by the Government's savings. I wonder whether they realise what the impact of these changes will be. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead referred to the fact that a working teenager might have to pay almost half of the family's housing costs. This point was made by the Social Security Advisory Committee. It said that this was unreasonable. If such a household were fortunate enough to have two working teenagers, the consequent deduction of £20.40 from housing benefit would mean that parents who are living on supplementary benefit would receive absolutely no housing benefit if their rent and rate payments were average.

This is in sharp contrast to the attitude of the Government's housing benefit review group, which pointed out that the full housing costs, whether rent or rates, of those on supplementary benefit should be met. The increases in non-dependant deductions mean that the Government are putting more and more people further and further away from having their costs met. This may result in public expenditure savings, but it will result in a very substantial increase in family tension. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West said that the Government will be making a saving of about £250 million by the introduction of these measures.

One of the documents to which reference has not been made is the report of the Government Actuary. Once again the Government are keeping the balance in the fund at 23 per cent. However, the Government Actuary, upon whose figures the Government are normally anxious to rely, says that a prudent Government need not set aside more than 16 per cent. of their income. The national insurance fund is a notional fund, but the Government appear to be raising substantially more income than they need. That means that it is not a notional sum. They must be raising about £1 billion more than they need to keep the national insurance fund in balance. They are also raising it in a most regressive way. It will be raised through national insurance contributions. The Government have made a number of changes, but they had not come into effect when these figures were drawn up. Not only are the Government raising substantially more money than they need; year by year they are also reducing the amount of money which is received in a more progressive way from the tax system through the Treasury supplement.

In effect, therefore, the Government, as in so many areas of our national life, are taking rather less from those who are more able to pay and rather more from those who are less able to pay. We have heard a great deal this week about why the Government believe it to be right to increase the salaries of the better-paid members of our community. It is in line with the Government's approach that the only figures in this package of measures which show an increase above the level of inflation are the non-dependants' housing benefit deductions. That is sadly characteristic of this Government's attitude. Although, therefore, we welcome some elements of the package, the Government do not deserve full credit for it.

8.37 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) for at least having the goodness to recognise, in contrast to her hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), that a number of factors in the uprating package are to be welcomed. She mentioned the changes to the vaccine damage payments and the changes that will affect nursing homes and residential care homes. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) was also good enough to welcome those changes.

The uprating will add more than £2 billion to our massive social security programme. Even in the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate I had hoped that the charity induced at the end of the term would lead to a greater welcome by the Opposition of this package. Perhaps that was too much to ask of the hon. Member for Oldham, West.

Turning to pensions, we had the vignette of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire travelling around his constituency at the weekend trying to explain to his constituency pensioners the significance of the uprating of the basic rate of pension. I hope that he was good enough to explain the real increase since the Government came into office. If we achieve the projected rate of inflation, down from 7 per cent., there will be a 10 percentage point increase in the real value of the basic rate of pensions since 1979. I recognise the situation that he described, and that a number of people take a lot of convincing because they are constantly bombarded with a good deal of propaganda in the other direction.

Labour Members and members of the TUC have taken to misrepresenting our proposals on the state earnings-related pension scheme as a cut in the basic retirement pension. As we have constantly said and demonstrated, and are clearly demonstrating again tonight with these orders, our commitment to maintaining the value of the basic retirement pension is absolute and is fulfilled. The elements in the cost of living to which the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire referred are taken into account in the RPI.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West saw some machiavellian plotting in the fact that to achieve many sensible advantages in introducing the uprating on an April to April basis, we were proceeding with two eight months uprating periods for pensions. He seemed to see some wickedness in that proposal. However, pensioners will have cause to recognise the benefit of that. It will more closely match the rate of inflation, although the hon. Gentleman seemed to have some worries that there would be a low or even no rate of inflation, which would cause problems for the pensioners.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, there has often been pressure for more frequent upratings than 12 months. I find it difficult to understand why he should be so concerned about uprating periods of eight months. The increase will reflect much more clearly the more immediate effect of the uprating from November 1985, and by July 1986 pensioners will have a much greater advantage. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not seek to attribute the sort of tactics that might appeal to less charitable Governments to this one.

Mr. Meacher: Will the hon. Gentleman accept my proposition that it is likely that in July 1986, if the Government's inflation forecast is met, pensioners will get no increase?

Mr. Whitney: We shall have to wait to see what turns out. I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman is so concerned that inflation should fall. I can understand that he might have some sensitivity about this, because he will remember, and he would like pensioners to forget, that the Government of which he was a member averaged an inflation rate of 16 per cent. in every year of office. Pensioners will never forget what that did to their savings. If the hon. Gentleman is upset that we are likely to have a low rate of inflation, I can assure him that pensioners will not be.

There was considerable discussion on child benefit, including the, as always, distinctive contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams), who appealed to all Christian democrats in the House to welcome the commitment that the Government have reinforced to the universal provision of child benefit. Child benefit is an extremely expensive social security provision. About 6·9 million families and 12·3 million children are involved. From listening to a number of Labour speeches one would have imagined that something desperate was being done, but about £75 million in a full year is being added to the £4·5 billion that we spend on that benefit.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) is clearly unable to be here now. However, in answer to his point, I can say that we are prepared to go into the next election reasserting our justified proposition that we are the party of the family, because provision at that scale, at a time of justified stringency in our national accounting, is something of which we are proud. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security pointed out, in addition to the increase, which I recognise is not fully in line with inflation, we have directed some of that to the lower end of the income scale through FIS and the housing benefit children's needs allowance.

Account has to be taken of the fact that the rest of the community—those who are not at the lower levels with which we are mostly concerned here—will benefit from our achievements in the years since 1979 on wage increases and tax changes. Since we came into office, the real income of the overwhelming majority has increased, whereas it fell for most people during the period of the Labour Government. The real take-home pay of a person on average earnings has gone up by 13 per cent.

Mrs. Beckett: I noticed with interest that part of the hon. Gentleman's justification is that most people are better off, but I understand that if one takes into acount the whole package of tax changes made by the Government, only people with incomes of over £18,000 a year are better off. The Minister may move in such circles, but not everybody else does.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Lady to the statistic that I quoted. When the Labour Government were in office, people were actually worse off, and that point must be taken into account. I particularly made the point that we are talking about people on average earnings. I recognise the unemployed, but that category is not at issue. The increase under this Government has come about because with our child benefit we are targeting help more accurately where it is clearly needed.

The next source of concern for Labour Members was the non-dependant deductions. That seemed to take little account of the wages being discussed. It is important to remember that we are talking about, for the full non-dependant deduction of £10·40 a week, people between 18 and pension age. We are not talking about those on supplementary benefit, or the youth training scheme or pensioners, for whom the deduction will amount to only £3·90, but about those over 18 who would be expected, if they are in work, to face a deduction of £10·40.

The average gross weekly earnings of 18-year-olds last year were £83·60 for males and £73·90 for females. In relation to figures like that, it cannot be maintained that a deduction of £10·40 is in any way unacceptable. The hon. Lady referred to the last time there was a sharp increase. It was in 1982 rather than in 1984, when, on the same formula, housing costs for supplementary benefit cases were met under the supplementary benefits scheme and the non-dependant deductions increased by 21 per cent. In the following year there was no change in this item, despite increases in the main housing benefit and the supplementary benefit rate. Therefore, claimants have both gained and lost over the years by the application of that rule.

The cuts in relation to heating attracted a certain amount of attention and there were one or two areas of misunderstanding. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire referred to the estate rate heating addition. That has not been changed and his worries on that score are unjustified. Many of the cases he referred to would be eligible for the higher rate heating addition, and we are not putting an end to that. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State pointed out, nowadays the justification for the central heating addition is, to put it mildly, considerably less than it was, and it is scarcely to be maintained.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) seemed to be disturbed that some of the measures contained in our uprating proposals are in harmony with the proposals in our review. It would be rather strange if that were not the case. Having said that, I am not saying that the consultation process is anything but an extremely genuine and far-reaching one. It is, of course, the second stage of a lengthy and unique public operation.

For something like 18 months my hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Minister of State had open hearings around the country and we received thousands of submissions. There were also many letters to the Department. After 18 months of careful study and review, all that resulted in the proposals. Then we had the period from June until mid-September for the second stage of the consultation process. I refer the House to another leaflet we shall be issuing today. It will give another fillip to this national process of consultation.

The House recognised the value of the increase in the limits on residential care and nursing homes and I welcome the support that those proposals received. When we introduced those measures, we said that we would continue to monitor their effects. The way in which we have done that has justified our promise. We recognise that the tightness of the nursing home provision and addition has caused difficulties, and I hope that the new figures we have announced, a £10 increase in the basic rate and the increase of the addition to £50, will improve the position.

The hon. Lady asked about the provisions relating to under-25s, known in our Department as the ordinary board and lodging. We shall maintain careful scrutiny and we have shown, as we promised, a good deal of flexibility on the time limits and the exemption categories. We have a proud record on that. Our initial indications do not at present suggest that there is the same sort of case for an overall increase in November in the ordinary board and lodging limits as for residential care and nursing homes which my hon. Friend has announced. That, too, is something which we shall keep under careful review, and we shall certainly monitor it very carefully.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not wish to press the Minister too much, but perhaps I could ask him to say a little more on this point. Will he give me an assurance that it is not the Government's intention to wait until July 1986 before announcing any increase in the limits? The Minister will know that the residential homes limits were considered to be inadequate. A couple of days ago the Leader of the House accused the Opposition of pandering to popular sentiment, and, although I do not accuse the Government of doing that, I suggest they are a little more worried about elderly people in residential homes than they are about the young, against whom they seem to have a particular dislike. I should like the Minister to assure us that it is not the Government's intention to wait for another full year.

Mr. Whitney: I should like to correct a misunderstanding which the hon. Lady has perpetrated more than once. She alleges some hostility on our part towards the young, but that is by no means the case. One of the reasons why we acted as we did was the great damage caused and the new unemployment trap. We shall continue to keep that under review as we kept under review, for example, the exemption categories. We showed our flexibility on that. We also kept under review the level of charges in residential care and nursing homes. By monitoring those, my right hon. Friend was able to announce charges. The evidence is lacking to suggest that there is a need, or may or may not be a need, for uprating.

We are considering an important range of additions to the social security programme. They include major increases in retirement benefit, unemployment benefit, and widow's pension and benefits. They are all of 7 per cent., which recognises that that was the increase in the RPI for May. If our hopes are fulfilled, it will mean a significant increase, by the time those proposals are implemented, above the cost of living at the end of November.

The upratings are another fulfilment of our pledges. We have increased invalidity pension by no less than 12 per cent. We have established our commitment to the Christmas bonus—understandably, that is a sore point with Opposition Members — we have doubled the vaccine damage payments, changed other benefits, and significantly increased residential care and nursing home allowances. The package will cost more than £2 billion. Since we came to office in 1979, we have increased our social security budget by more than 30 per cent. in real terms. Most of the increase is accounted for by higher real-terms increases in all the major benefits scales. We are also paying for about 800,000 more pensioners.

The Government are proud of that record, and I commend the regulations to the House.

Arthur Bell and Sons (Guinness Takeover Bid)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

9 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to debate the attempted takeover of Arthur Bell and Sons, a Scotch whisky company in Perth, by Guinness. I wish to make it clear from the outset that my concern in this matter is that of a constituency Member of Parliament and also the public interest. As I had to tell the BBC earlier today, in this matter I am no one's lackey. Neither I nor any members of my family have shares in Arthur Bell and Sons or in Guinness. During this short debate, I am afraid that I shall have some harsh comments to make about the self-regulating body of the City—the Panel on Take-overs and Mergers. I shall also make some comments about the role of the Bank of England in this matter.

Let me make it clear to the House that I support the stock market and that I am a passionate believer in the private sector and in the capitalist system. What I say this evening should not be taken as a reflection of my belief in this area. There are advantages in a self-regulatory mechanism, but I firmly believe that such a mechanism must be seen to be fair, and that justice must be seen to be done when the panel operates.

In the case of the attempted takeover of Arthur Bell and Sons by Guinness, I hope that I shall demonstrate clearly to the House that justice was not done, and was certainly not seen to be done. I shall also demonstrate that what one of my more flamboyant hon. Friends called, "Skulduggery in the smoke-filled rooms of the City," has taken place.

I regret very much the fact that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not wait to hear the evidence that I shall present this evening before deciding on the matter. All aspects of this attempted takeover should have been more fully investigated, as I requested, by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. During the past few weeks, I and several other Scottish Members from all political parties have made repeated requests for a referral to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. My hon. Friend must realise that the fact that that did not happen will not be forgotten in Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that, recently, there has been a dark cloud hanging over the activities of many stock and insurance markets. Following the disclosure of murky and dishonest activities by individuals and by groups of individuals in the system, Lloyd's was forced to introduce new rules and to insist on a new code of conduct. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has little reason to be pleased with the way in which the Bank of England behaved during the costly farce of Johnson Matthey Bankers, yet the Bank of England is supposed to be the guardian of the standards and morals of the City. The former deputy governor of the bank is the chairman of the Panel on Take-overs and Mergers.

The Financial Times of Friday 19 July, referring to a decision taken by the panel, said:

"The conclusion, it seems, is that Mr. David Stevens—the chairman of the two companies — was not in concert with himself but agrees that he should be regarded as if he were. This is nonsense. Given the widespread concern about the Panel's future ability to police a City impregnated with conflicts of interest, it is also worrying nonsense."

Having once been found out in a massive cover-up, any reasonable person must wonder whether it is just possible that the bank will again be party to another cover-up; party to an attempt to whitewash unacceptable acts in the stock market by firms and individuals which operate within the system.

Unless the Chinese walls of the City are seen to work, and unless they are believed to be an effective safeguard against inside vital knowledge being made available to unfriendly sources, the morals and credibility of the City must be at risk. If the Chinese walls can be or have been breached, this would not be good for the wellbeing of the capitalist system, the private sector or the stock market. I care very deeply about this, which is why I requested a meeting with my right hon. Friend and asked for the debate.

I shall present my evidence this evening in three parts. They are, first, the activities of the bankers Morgan Grenfell and Company Ltd. and the panel on Take-overs and Mergers; secondly, the misrepresentation of the facts by Guinness; and, thirdly, the importance of the independence of Arthur Bell and the importance of the whisky industry and the Scottish financial institutions to Scotland.

No one disputes that on 3 February 1983 the chairman of Arthur Bell wrote to Morgan Grenfell and suggested:

"best interests would be served by a gradual winding down of our business connections."

What is in dispute are the events that followed. Morgan Grenfell claimed that the winding down was exactly what happened. The Panel on Take-overs and Mergers believed it. I do not, and I believe that I can show that the events which followed that letter demonstrate that Morgan Grenfell made determined efforts to retain its business connection with Bell and, what is more important, that it retained its business connection.

I have a letter dated 15 February 1983 written by Mr. Christopher Reeves to Mr. Miquel, the chairman of Arthur Bell and Sons:

"We have had a very long relationship with your company and with yourself and I believe that David Ewart and Christopher Knight, the new Assistant Director whom I have allocated to you, will provide the sort of service that your are seeking."

The letter continues:

"I do however hope that it will be possible for us to get together later on this year to review the progress that is being made on a series of most important moves for the development of your company."

The letter contains other matters, but those are the important phrases. That was dated 15 February, which is after the so-called severance of the two concerns.

I believe that I can show more than that. Morgan Grenfell actually improved the way in which it serviced Bell, and it did so, as the letter clearly shows, by the setting up of a new team to service Bell's. On 8 February 1983 Mr. Christopher Reeves, the chairman of Morgan Grenfell, wrote to Mr. Miquel concerning a meeting at 1.30 pm in the Connaught hotel. On 18 February Mr. David Ewart, director of Morgan Grenfell, wrote to confirm the visit by himself and Christopher Knight to East Mains, Dunfermline, Perth, and Pitlochry. This was to acquaint the new team with more of the details of the company. Mr. David Ewart wrote to Mr. Miquel on 10 May 1983, talking about companies that might be suitable for takeover.

On 23 March 1983 there was a meeting in the London Hilton, attended by Mr. Miquel of Bell's, Mr. Cooper of Bell's and Mr. Reeves, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Knight of Morgan Grenfell. At that meeting Morgan Grenfell was asked to prepare a list of prospective acquisitions. On 22 July 1983 Mr. Cooper of Bell's wrote to Mr. Ewart:

"As you know we aim to provide a comprehensive range of financial advisory services to our clients, but the extent to which those services are called upon varies considerably from client to client."

That letter discusses the charges that Bell's would have to pay. It continues:

"It is our wish to provide Bell's with the best possible advice and best possible services."

On 7 July 1983, writing to Mr. Cooper, Morgan Grenfell said that there was a large public company, with a turnover of £1·5 billion, which was in trouble and in which Bell's might be interested. The letter also mentioned another company in the food industry. It is an interesting letter.

On 3 February 1984 Mr. Ewart wrote to Mr. Miquel:

"As you probably know I was at the Panel today with Patrick and was simply delighted at the final ruling. I enclose a copy of the Financial Times referring to . . . I rang Geoffrey Cooper and mentioned it to him this morning."

That is another company being suggested to Bell's.

On 20 April 1984 copies of reports and accounts were sent from Mr. Ewart to Mr. Miquel. On 28 March 1984 Mr. Colville wrote to Mr. Cooper suggesting an involvement in a sector in the United States On 15 March 1984 Mr. Miquel wrote to Mr. Ewart thanking Morgan Grenfell for its assistance in bringing Gleneagles Hotels plc into the Bell's group.

On 9 April 1984 Mr. Ewart wrote to Mr. Miquel referring to "grand slam", that being the code name for a well-known company in the United Kingdom. On 25 May Mr. Miquel wrote to the chairman of Morgan Grenfell about "grand slam" saying:

"I am looking forward to you and your team joining us here next Friday."

A copy of the letter was sent to Mr. Ewart.

On 9 May the secretary to Mr. Ewart wrote to the secretary of Arthur Bell's outlining details of the timetable for the meeting on Tuesday 22 May. Mr. Ewart was to join Mr. Miquel at the Sheraton Park hotel, Knightsbridge, for breakfast. They were then to take a taxi to Victoria, to catch the 10.30 am train to arrive at their destination at 11 am. On arrival they were to be met by a chauffeured car, the property of the chairman of "grand slam"—a well known company in the transport and hotel industries.

On 22 June 1984 Mr. Ewart wrote to Mr. Miquel with information about a company code named MATCH. He said:

"We will need to discuss our next step, clearly . . . is a man who has to be handled with some care and we have to consider whether it is best for you to make a direct approach to him or whether we should get in touch with Hill Samuel, the company's advisors."

On 5 October 1984 Mr. Colville wrote to Mr. Cooper at Bell's:

"As requested by you we have carried out"— and this is important——

"an update of our information on the above company. (Enclosed reports and information.) Please do not hesitate to contact me if there is any further information you require."

On 14 December 1984—close to the date when we first heard about the proposed takeover—Mr. Ewart wrote to Mr. Cooper a detailed letter, of which I have been fortunate enough to obtain a copy. The letter refers to the group structure of Bell's. Morgan Grenfell is advising Bell's on its group corporate structure and financial planning. The letter concerns the transfer of trading activities to a holding company and states:

"From a taxation point of view such a change would be quite straightforward with capital gains tax losses remaining with the holding company whereas trading losses would normally accompany the trade and undertaking to the new subsidiary."

The letter discusses the forming of a new company, the effect on Bell's debenture and loan stock, the cost of that, the public relations aspect, the timing and so on. That letter was dated 14 December, which shows that Morgan Grenfell was immersed in Bell's structure, its corporate planning and its future at that date. To suggest some months later that somehow it was not involved is nonsense, and I shall show why.

Mr. Christopher Reeves writes to Mr. Miquel on 14 November 1984 thanking him for his good wishes on his new appointment, and continuing:

"These are certainly interesting times in the City and I look forward to the challenges ahead. I too am sorry that we will not be able to meet in Edinburgh in December, but no doubt there will be another opportunity for us to get together, either in Scotland or in London."

On 20 December 1984 Mr. A. J. Corville of Morgan Grenfell wrote to Mr. Cooper at Bell's:

"Accounts of"— a liquor company—

"Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance in relation to this Company."

Here is another proposed takeover. The minutes of Bell's board meetings throughout 1983 and 1984 discloses details of discussions and agreements on sensitive matters involving Bell's and Morgan Grenfell, plus details of accounts rendered when there was supposed no longer to be any connection with Bell's. They were accounts rendered and paid for. In March 1985, only days before the beginning of the events, I saw a letter inviting Mr. Miquel to attend with Morgan Grenfell a seminar on investment opportunities in Australia.

I believe that all this evidence—there is much more; I took what was only a sample—clearly demonstrates that Morgan Grenfell was working as Bell's merchant bankers right up to the time when the Guinness takeover was launched.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Miquel was asked to lunch on 21 November 1984 with Mr. Ian Watson, city editor of the Sunday Telegraph. Mr. Watson mentioned that a company was interested in acquiring information on Bell's. What is more, the bankers acting for that company were Bell's own bankers.

Mr. Miquel did not believe the story, yet it was confirmed later at the lunch by a colleague of Mr. Watson. On returning to Scotland, Mr. Miquel telephoned Mr. Christopher Reeves of Morgan Grenfell. He as unavailable, being in Europe. Mr. Miquel then spoke to Mr. David Ewart, who said "that he would be surprised if this was the case—and if it was, it was nothing to do with him."

Mr. Miquel was not satisfied and asked for Mr. Reeves to contact him to confirm that the information he had received was not correct. Mr. Reeves did not contact Mr. Miquel further.

[Mr. Bill Walker]

All this information, and more, was available to the panel. I believe that it represents a clear case which shows that Morgan Grenfell was working both for Bell's and Guinness at the same time. I cannot believe that the managing director of Morgan Grenfell, Mr Christopher Reeves, Mr. David Ewart, and the director Richmond Watson, in charge of the Guinness takeover attempt, exchange only pleasantries when they meet.

I suggest that there is a prima facie case of the Chinese walls of the city having been breached. Is it any wonder that I must ask whether the panel decision was a whitewash, particularly when one realises that there is no recognised appeal procedure against panel decisions? That is why I wanted to consult the Minister before the decision was taken to go to the commission.

I draw the Minister's attention to reports that have appeared in the press in recent days to the effect that the Kuwait Investment Office bought 3·8 per cent. of Bell's stock on 17 June 1985, three days after the bid was announced. It bought at an average price of 270p, at a total cost of £13·5 million. It has also been reported, and not denied, that it has accepted, on its own behalf, 225p for all of the 3·8 per cent. share.

I remind the Minister that in January 1984 the Kuwait Investment Office was the under-bidder in the purchase of Gleneagles Hotels plc. Why, then, is it buying shares in Bell's at 270p and, a few days later, selling them for 225p, thus creating for itself a substantial loss? What is the pay off? Surely that is a reasonable question. Could it be that it will be given the chance to buy Gleneagles Hotels if Guinness is successful in its bid for Bell's? If so, this smacks of people acting in concert. Is this another example of "skulduggery in the smoke-filled rooms of the City"?

I am reminded that Mr. Peter Stevenson, a director of Moble Grossart, who is well known to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on the Front Bench, is, with some of his friends, a defender of an independent Scottish economy. It is Mr. Peter Stevenson who has attacked me in the press. I remind the House that he was a director of Gleneagles Hotels before the company was taken over by Bell's. Is that just another coincidence? Whatever it is, I find it fascinating that Arab money is used to purchase shares in a liquor company when the mere possession of liquor in Arab countries leads to flogging and/or imprisonment.

In the words of the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), the Guinness publicity machine has been issuing statements that are unpersuasive and positively misleading. Why does Guinness want Bell's? The answer is that it needs Bell's to pay its United Kingdom dividend. If Mr. Saunders, who seems never to spend more than four years with any company, does not increase his dividend, he will be seen to be a facade. He does not wait for the truth about his pruning and surgery to emerge. He moves on before the truth emerges.

For example, pledges of no redundancies from Mr. Saunders are worthless. A few days before Christmas 1984, Guinness told its workers in Liverpool that they were managed by people who lived in the area and that they had strong local ties and roots. However, in May 1985, well over 200 long-service, loyal employees were made redundant. In 1984 Guinness took over Martin, the newsagents. The staff were given assurances that there would be no redundancies. Despite the assurances, many long-serving, loyal staff were made redundant.

Guinness has problems and Bell's does not. Guinness cannot get its overseas profits into this country to pay its United Kingdom dividend. I understand that profits from Nigeria can take up to two years to get into the United Kingdom. Guinness is writing off advance corporation tax and it does not have enough United Kingdom earnings to pay its dividend. Guinness is in trouble and Bell's is not.

Bell's is a different sort of company from Guinness. I would describe Bell's as an ideal company. It is an identikit company of the Tory party. It is the sort of company that the Tory party dreams about. It increases sales every year but never cuts its prices to do so. It increases its profits every year and it has no redundancies. When it builds new plants and factories many miles away from existing sites, it busses its employees. Indeed, it has been doing so for over 20 years. Bussing is not a recent phenomenon in the Bell's organisation. It is the sort of company that every Member dreams about having in his constituency. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members will tell me how fortunate I am.

The Bell's staff receive the same allocations for shares and get the same shares as directors when shares are allotted. Everyone in Bell's is treated alike and everyone works hard. The Scottish institutions, God bless them, have recognised this. They have remained with Bell's and I am thankful to them for that. They recognise that if Scotland has no home-based, profitable firms, the very reason for the existence of the Scottish financial centre will vanish. If we lose Bell's, which company will be next? Will it be The Famous Grouse, which is also in my constituency? Perhaps Mr. Saunders will have his eye on Distillers which, again, is in my constituency. I have an interest in the welfare of the Scottish whisky industry.

I can provide my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State with all the evidence that I have used this evening and much more besides. Perhaps it is not too late to prevent the destruction of the good name of the City, about which I care deeply. More importantly from a Scottish point of view, I hope that we can protect and safeguard the Scottish-based whisky industry, which has done so well for Scotland for so many years. It has been kind to the Exchequer for many years and it has helped the balance of payments for many years, which it will continue to do if it is managed effectively and efficiently by those who care.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) for the opportunity to respond to certain views which he has expressed about the conduct of the Arthur Guinness bid for Arthur Bell, and takeover bids generally. He properly disclosed his interests in both companies by saying that he had no financial interests in either company. I can add to that by saying that I know for certain that he is not even a customer of Bell's or Guinness.

First, the merits of the bid and the way in which it is pursued are separate questions. My hon. Friend's view is that the bid has no merit, and that Bell's should remain independent. He is perfectly entitled to take that view, whether on the basis of a detailed evaluation of the Guinness offer or on broader constituency grounds. I wholeheartedly agree with him that Bell's is a highly respected company. It has a good commercial reputation for its performance over many years, and as a neighbour. It is a good company from a social point of view, not only in the city of Perth but in Scotland as a whole. It is probably improper for me to say that Bell's has also been a good friend to the House from time to time.

However, it is Bell's shareholders, rather than I, whom my hon. Friend needs to persuade that he is right. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had decided not to refer the proposal to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, as he announded on 23 July. The decision is in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading, and was taken after full consideration of all the relevant issues. I discussed the issues with both companies, my hon. Friend and other hon. Members. They in turn, took the opportunity to present their cases to the Director General before he made his recommendations to Ministers.

It is now for the shareholders of Bell's to make up their minds and to proceed accordingly. They may or may not reach the same conclusion as my hon. Friend. The point is that the decision rests with them, not with the Government. I have made it clear to my hon. Friend that the Government's interest in such matters is in competition and the public interest. All the other matters relating to the performance and management of a company or companies, such as which is the better exporter, are clearly for the shareholders to decide. The grounds on which they make the decision are their own affair.

The essential questions for any shareholder in a company for which a bid is made are whether the consideration offered is adequate, and whether the acquisition of control by the bidder would or would not enhance the value of his asset. Those questions are not for the House because this is not the place to consider those commercial aspects of the bid.

My hon. Friend argued against the bid on grounds of propriety. In particular, he argued that the relationship which existed between the merchant bank Morgan Grenfell and Bell's before the bid should preclude Morgan Grenfell form acting for Guinness. He contends that the takeover panel erred in allowing Morgan Grenfell to act for Guinness, and suggests that alternative arrangements for regulating takeovers should be considered.

My hon. Friend is right to stress the importance of propriety in these matters, because that concerns the Government, but who acts for whom in the conduct of a takeover bid raises quite different issues from the merits of the bid as a commercial consideration. In any event, the circumstances that my hon. Friend has cited do not, in my view, justify the conclusion that it is improper for Morgan Grenfell to act for Guinness, or that the panel's judgment was flawed.

My hon. Friend suggested that justice has not been done in the City, but it is now about 20 years since the panel was constituted and the first code promulgated. That is a short time in terms of some City institutions but a fairly long one in terms of the developments that have taken place in securities markets over the past two decades. During that time the panel has been faced with numerous "vital and important" decisions. I quote my hon. Friend, and his words are apt. Their verdicts have not all been accepted nem. con. It would be remarkable — and dubiously to the panel's credit — if they had. But the panel and the code have come to be accepted—indeed, they have been judicially recognised — as setting the standards which should obtain in this area.

The proposals set out in the Goverment's White Paper, "Financial Services in the United Kingdom", inevitably call into question whether the code and panel can continue to operate on the extra-statutory basis on which they have operated hitherto. The Government have not yet reached a conclusion, but we are no more minded than our predecessors have been to second-guess judgments taken by the panel on the basis of full consideration of all the material facts, particularly when neither of the parties directly affected has represented that the judgment was flawed.

Mr. Bill Walker: That is not true.

Mr. Fletcher: I have had no representations from Arthur Bell about the conduct of the panel. Bearing in mind my responsibilities and, more importantly, those of my right hon. Friend in these matters, I would expect a company that was under threat of takeover to make very strong representations. In my present post I am used to chairmen of companies and counsel coming to see me frequently to make representations in matters of this kind. I can only declare my surprise, in view of my hon. Friend's comments, that it has not happened in this case.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend is not denying that I asked for a meeting. I only cancelled it subsequent to the decision on the referral. My hon. Friend will be aware that I asked for that meeting, and I gave details of who would probably be coming to it.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes, that is correct.

I say to my hon. Friend in the friendliest possible way that if Arthur Bell and Company and their advisers feel half as strongly about the matter as my hon. Friend suggests, that justice has not been done in the City, and that they have been deceived and treated badly, I can only express my surprise that they should cancel the meeting. The fact that a decision had been made not to refer the matter is one thing. The fact that they felt that the City institutions were behaving dishonourably towards them is quite another. If the company felt as strongly as my hon. Friend suggests, it should have made a complaint.

I am concerned that, in his very strong defence of Arthur Bell and Company this evening, my hon. Friend should have impugned Lloyd's and the Bank of England, and generally the good name of the City, particularly in the light of the fact that we have had no representations from Bell on these matters.

However, I am particularly sorry that my hon. Friend has repeated in the House that the Deputy Governor of the Bank of England is the chairman of the takeover panel, because he is not. They are two quite separate persons. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of England is Mr. C. W. McMahon and the chairman of the takeover panel is Sir Jasper Hollom. I have seen no evidence from my hon. Friend and he made no justification for his charges about the City. I repeat that I understand how strongly he feels. However, an hon. Member always has to be careful about abusing parliamentary privilege when making representations of this sort unless they can be properly substantiated.

Mr. Bill Walker: If I have in any way impugned the Bank of England incorrectly, I withdraw unreservedly and apologise. I shall investigate further.

Mr. Fletcher: I am sure that my hon. Friend's remark will be appreciated by those concerned.

It would not be right for me to go into matters of detail furnished to the takeover panel on the basis that they would be treated in confidence. I shall confine myself to a couple of essential facts. The first is that both Guinness and Bell's agreed of their own free will to accept the panel's verdict. There was nothing to stop Bell's from pressing objections at law to Morgan Grenfell advising Guinness. They were not obliged to let the panel decide. They chose to. I have had no representations from them that the panel should have reached a different view.

The second is that, while I do not doubt my hon. Friend's good faith, my inquiries throw a rather different light on this matter. If my hon. Friend took another look at Bell's files, he might observe that in the Gleneagles case that he mentioned Morgan Grenfell acted not for Bell's but for the other side.

Mr. Bill Walker: I knew that.

Mr. Fletcher: He might also entertain the possibility that the letters referred to in the panel's decision terminated Morgan Grenfell's position as Bell's merchant banker. In those circumstances he might think it natural enough that Morgan Grenfell should make some attempt to restore it, hence the contents of the letters that I listened to very carefully and my hon. Friend's reference to a new team to serve Bells.

However, the point is that Bell's and Morgan Grenfell decided to accept the panel's verdict on this matter, and this they have done. The future of Bell's is now, correctly in my view, in the hands of the company's shareholders.

Space Technology

9.37 pm

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate the United Kingdom space technology programme. I make that comment in no ordinary sense because the facility provided for an additional Adjournment debate is much appreciated, and I am grateful for the help which I have had from Mr. Speaker's office in making this possible.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Information Technology for being in his place. I hope that he, too, will regard this as a useful opportunity to discuss a very important subject which we get all too few opportunities to debate.

I am also conscious that my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy), who referred to the undoubted British success in the Glotto satellite launches, is in his place, as are my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and others of my hon. Friends.

I take a slightly old-fashioned view in referring these days to the Supply Estimates. Under our more flexible system, we do not need to justify subject matters in initiating debates in the House. But it is important to hon. Members who may wish to look at these matters in more detail to refer to class IV, vote 6, of the Supply Estimates, which relate to scientific and technological assistance by the Department of Trade and Industry. Those who do so will find the sum of £65 million in the current Supply Estimates as expenditure, for domestic and civil space programmes to the extent of just under £14 million and contributions to the European Space Agency to the extent of £51 million.

It is to the European Space Agency that I want first to address my remarks.

I should declare my interests at the outset. I am the parliamentary adviser to the Space and Communications Division of British Aerospace. But in this context I am also proud to declare my interest as chairman of the all-party Space Committee, and it was in that latter capacity that I returned earlier this month from Kourou in French Guiana after witnessing the successful launch of the British-led Glotto satellite by the European Ariane launcher.

The significance of that experience, was, I believe, twofold. The first is that, with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, officials and representatives from all our European partners, we were privileged to see what an outstandingly successful facility we have in the Ariane space launch facility. We were part of space history and of a genuine success story for European technological collaboration. The delegation from the House, which included the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) — in this context I regard him as a friend — the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), represented the all-party space committee and we witnessed the successful demonstration of that launch capability in a precise time slot.

Had there been any hitch in the launch capability or the delivery of the satellite, we should not have witnessed the arrangements by which that satellite is to explore Halley's comet — named after the second Astronomer Royal, Esmond Halley—and we should not have been able to see the successful launch of that mission. Indeed, it would be about 76 years before one could hope to see that exercise repeated.

Within Arianespace, as is perhaps well known, there is a majority French stake, but there is also a United Kingdom equity stake. I understand that British Aerospace and other parts of British industry have a current interest in increasing the United Kingdom equity stake. I hope that my hon. Friend may feel able to comment on that point tonight because I believe that we should all welcome that kind of increased participation in an undoubted European success.

The rocket stabiliser and some of the launch equipment comes from this country and therefore we have a direct industrial stake in the Arianespace rocketry.

I also appreciate the fact that the Department of Trade and Industry contributes to the Arianespace technological fund and to the cost of the launch site.

On the evidence of our visit to Kourou, that investment and the financial support for which the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible is well placed. I have already said how the European launch capability has a proven track record. It compares extremely well with the United States shuttle and is acquiring its own consumer preference. Above all, it provides competition for the American space shuttle without which we should have all been captive to that launch facility.

Significantly, in the case of the Giotto satellite, Arianespace did not just put the satellite successfully into orbit in the precise time slot, we also saw the launching of a satellite in which British Aerospace had the opportunity, as the prime contractor, to demonstrate yet again that with communications satellites, remote sensoring and scientific development, the United Kingdom — that is not confined to British Aerospace because Marconi, Ferranti and many other companies are involved — has a major facility and success on its industrial horizon.

The second significant feature of the Kourou experience was not just that we saw a European consortium led by British Aerospace, but I have great pleasure in putting on record the fact — we frequently reflect on the difficulties and problems that surround us — that we had a project on which it was crucial to deliver on time, to specification and price, and that all those points were met. Any slippage or failures, as I said, would have meant nothing less than a three quarters of a century delay before we tried again.

Now we must wait until March 1986 for the future exploration of Halley's comet. The satellite will attempt to take television cameras within 500 km of the comet's nucleus. That is an exciting project and one which has captured the imagination of young people throughout Europe. I welcome the way in which an effort has been made to attract their interest. That is not only important industrially and scientifically but is part of the way in which youthful enthusiasm for these matters can be harnessed to work which is important and which points to growing job opportunities in space technology.

As for the Giotto-Halley's Comet mission, we look forward to a steady stream of technical and scientific data, and a unique study of the comet, that will be directly related and relayed, as is other current work within the European Space Agency — be it on communications satellites, remote sensing satellites or the whole raft of space technology — to ESA's ground facilities, particularly to the research and technological centre, known as ESTEC, in Holland and the space operations centre, known as ESOC, in Germany.

The all-party space committee was indebted not only to Arianespace for the Kornou unit but also to ESA for subsequent visits to the ESTEC and ESOC facilities in Holland and Germany. We could not have been more impressed, not only by the level of expertise and dedication of all who work there on our behalf but also by the genuine European spirit that was evident. There are times when we in the House perhaps feel that the European ideal is weakening and that there are few success stories, but we certainly have one in the European Space Agency.

At the same time, I cannot ignore the fact that wherever we went we met substantial numbers of British scientists and engineers, whose work is highly regarded, they were seen as key personnel and employees within the European Space Agency.

Within the Europan Space Agency and the European launch capability of Arianespace we have as I indicated earlier a real success story. The Minister has played a notable part in the European Space Agency family and at the ministerial meeting in Rome earlier this year, not only by reinforcing and supporting the future of ESA but by committing the United Kingdom to a substantial stake in that work. I hope that he will take this opportunity particularly to reaffirm the Government's commitment to the future of ESA. As I see it, we now have a long-term committment because of the agreement at the summit on the future of manned space stations and the opportunity for ESA and NASA to work together. That is also true of the whole range of ESA activities that I have tried to outline.

I hope that the Minister will also say something about two major domestic issues. The first is direct broadcasting by satellite. Widespread disappointment has been expressed at the apparent collapse of the so-called "club of 21" — the attempt by the BBC and the independent television companies to decide how to use a British approach through UNISAT, the industrial consortium of British Aerospace, Marconi and British Telecom.

I must report that in talks between the all-party space committee and the European Space Agency, one of the factors that in a sense rubbed in our disappointment was the strong feeling that within Europe there is now a major growth of direct broadcasting by satellite. There is the French-German scheme, and there is now the strong possibility of an Irish-Portuguese DBS system. There is also the Italian DBS provided on the ESA large satellite capability. However, for a variety of reasons, the United Kingdom proposals have run into the sand.

The Government are inclined to say that it is for the television industry and the industrial suppliers to work this through. But given the experience of other European countries, two things must be said. First, within ESA and elsewhere we were told time and again that Europe cries out for the quality of British programming. It would therefore be the ultimate irony if the only English language programming came from the English language service of the French-German satellite or another source that were essentially oriented outside the United Kingdom. I am not simply making a chauvinistic point about the excellence of our programmes. There are also a wide range of industrial implications. By definition, anybody who is involved in direct broadcasting by satellite will be involved in the opportunities for industrial development in down link equipment, dishes and many other items. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology will be able to say a few words about what the Government can do to facilitate a new initiative on United Kingdom direct broadcasting by satellite. The widespread assumption is that the Home Office will call for new franchises. I appreciate his problem in speaking on behalf of other Departments, but anything that my hon. Friend can say to encourage those who have an interest in these matters will be timely.

Finally, I am anxious that an early announcement should be made about the proposed United Kingdom space centre. I appreciate that many problems have to be overcome. For example, it is important that the right people and the right site should be chosen for the centre. The bringing together of major Departments, notably the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of Education and Science and the Ministry of Defence, would be a logical extension of one of the unsung successes of the Government: the creation of interdepartmental liaison.

It should also draw on some of the outstanding work on behalf of British science in centres of excellance such as the Rutherford Appleton laboratory.

The future success of our space policy will very much depend upon whether a space centre can be established. This takes on added significance in terms of the summit commitment to explore the possibility of European-American collaboration on space platforms.

We must also consider whether the United Kingdom can play a role with the United States in the strategic defence initiative. Space is an area of high policy and we must adopt an effective approach. A space centre would be a logical channel for that policy. I am pleased about the Government's commitment in principle and I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to make an announcement before we return from the summer recess. If he can, he will be doing a service not only to the House but to the country.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): The record shows that this Government have provided sustained financial and political support for the development of space technology and the space industry in Britain. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) for providing me with an opportunity to put some of these facts on the record. I am also grateful for the sustained and well-informed interest that, as chairman of the all-party committee on space, he takes in the subject. In the past five years my Department has invested nearly £300 million in space technology, and the annual expenditure has increased by some 45 per cent. Civil space expenditure across the whole of Government has risen broadly in line with this. Over the same period, the performance of the British space industry has out-paced this growth. From a turnover of less than £100 million in 1979, the industry's turnover is estimated in the current year at £250 million. This year, British companies led the two competing consortia to fill a contract for $150 million to provide maritime communications satellites to INMARSAT. British Aerospace led the successful bid and the way in which the major American space companies were prepared to take a back-seat shows the high standing which the British industry enjoys throughout the world. United Kingdom industry has also secured the largest non-United States share of the most recent procurement by the international telecommunications satellite organisation INTELSAT.

In the defence market, an all-British consortium of British Aerospace and GEC-Marconi followed up its contract for two SKYNET IV satellites by winning a further order this year for a third satellite. The latest contract will be worth some £40 to £50 million. The companies are pursuing international markets in this sector with full Government support and encouragement.

My Department's primary objective in supporting civil space research and development has been to promote the development of profitable industrial and commercial organisations capable of producing and exploiting space hardware, software and services — particularly in communications. Employment in the industry is growing at more than 10 per cent. a year and the current order book is twice the size of annual turnover. Space is a success story, and we are undoubtedly achieving our objective. The continuity of the Government's policy has been an important factor in providing a stable climate for growth, but the responsibility, and congratulations for that growth lie, quite rightly, with the industry itself.

The space business is a risky business and, just as it has been impossible for the space industry to bear the burden of investment by itself, so it has been important for the United Kingdom to co-operate with the Governments and industries of other countries in major development projects. The United States and the Soviet Union have had the economic strength, political will and defence requirement to develop a fully comprehensive space capability. There is now a recognised third force in space —Europe. By collaborating through the European Space Agency, the 11 member states and three associates have between them also developed a comprehensive capability.

Britain was a prime mover in establishing the agency in the early 1970s, and we continue to devote some three-quarters of our space technology expenditure directly to the programmes of the agency. We have in particular concentrated our efforts on the communications satellite programmes and enabled British industry to achieve prime contractorship on every major programme in this sector. This has paved the way for the commercial successes of which I spoke earlier. Our participation in other projects has been necessarily more modest but no less impressive. The guidance system on the European rocket Ariane is supplied by Ferranti and the launcher has delivered its payloads into orbit with such accuracy that the life of the satellites has been extended by up to two years.

The United Kingdom has also an internationally renowned space science community. In the ESA's mandatory science programme, British scientists have been extremely successful in their proposals for flying instruments on European satellites, and in obtaining observation time in competition with proposals from scientists in other member states. The same is true of their co-operation with the United States. The Spacelab 2 shuttle flight, which is due to be launched next week, will carry two United Kingdom scientific experiments—the only non-American experiments selected by NASA for this United States scientific mission. Incidentally, the pallets on which the experiments will be flown were manufactured by British Aerospace.

The Government will continue to support the development of space technology by sponsoring projects which break new technological ground but also promise long-term commercial potential. I therefore gave full support for the new 10-year long-term plan of the European Space Agency which was discussed at the Ministerial Council in Rome at the end of January.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): My hon. Friend is making a generous tribute to British Aerospace, and that means many of my constituents both in the management and work force who contribute towards the wonderful work in the space programme. The work force and management at British Aerospace equally appreciate the dedication and interest that my hon. Friend and his colleagues in the Government have shown in paving the way towards making sure that the United Kingdom is a major force in the space business.

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those kind remarks. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel has already mentioned that he and I were present in French Guiana when the Giotto satellite was launched. We were not only very impressed by the work carried out by the British Aerospace team, but when I met the people concerned I was impressed by their sheer professionalism and dedication. Within the overall plan, I expect the British contribution to provide continued support in communications in the ESA programme, with the development of payloads and on-board switching techniques for the markets of the mid to late 1990s and in existing and new satellite remote sensing programmes.

It being Ten O'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Pattie: The latter will include not only the development of conventional satellites but their successors, the refuellable, maintainable space platforms which will form part of the international space station capability.

Following the agreement in Rome, work has now begun on the preparatory phase of the European space station-related progamme Columbus. Originally a proposal by Germany and Italy for a pressurised laboratory module and astronaut-tended co-orbiting platforms, the programme has been expanded to take account of British proposals which include platforms operating in the polar orbits, particularly suitable for remote sensing. British Aerospace has now won the ESA contract to lead on the development of all the platform elements in the Columbus programme and its proposals have attracted great interest in the United States from both the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The space station project will entail major advances in technology and in the way in which we operate in space. The presence of the space station will eventually impact on the design of all spacecraft, and the Government believe that it is essential to assess the costs and benefits of the programme from the close involvement which we gain as a full participant in the project definition phase.

We shall also be looking to substantiate the prospects which are foreseen in the programme for major advances in technologies with clearly identifiable terrestrial application, such as robotics, data management and communications. British companies are involved in all these areas and it is important for us to take advantage of the opportunities to build up our technology in them. We also need to gain access to the various parts of the space station for our user community. However, we were keen to obtain leadership on the platform elements because we believe that, particularly in its polar-orbiting form, the platform best meets the needs of those users we have already identified; that it would be attractive to the United States as part of their own capability; that it is well suited to the skills which our industry can offer; and, most importantly, that it looks the most commercially promising part of the programme.

If I have emphasised the more commercial programmes of the ESA, it is because my Department is responsible for the Government's contribution to these. But it would be wrong to discuss space technology without returning to our scientific successes which I touched on earlier and in particular to congratulate the European scientists and engineers involved in the Giotto programme to intercept Halley's comet. I was privileged to be in French Guiana on 2 July when Giotto was launched, as were my hon. Friend who initiated the debate and some of the members of the All-Party Space Committee.

The choice of mission shows great imagination by the European science community. This spacecraft will provide information about comets that is expected to provide clues to the origins of the universe. At the same time it will attract great public attention and generate interest in the achievements of both the United Kingdom and the European space programmes. Great ingenuity has been shown in squeezing as many as 10 experiments on the spacecraft, and one of the British experiments, the dust impaction detector, even makes use of the shield designed to protect the spacecraft during the early stages of the encounter. The spacecraft was primed by British Aerospace leading a European consortium. It is a remarkable compliment to industry's ability to work to severe time pressures that the development has taken less than four years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel said, when the target does not reappear for 76 years, industry could not afford to miss the very narrow launch window which was available. Other areas of British industry could usefully study the techniques practised by our leading space companies to learn ways of increasing quality and reliability.

While our contributions to the programmes of the ESA have grown, we have also seen an increase in the complementary national programme of space technology which my Department supports. Much of this is managed by staff at the Royal Aircraft Establishment at Farnborough, including the National Remote Sensing Centre which is housed at the establishment. The programme involves the development of space technologies which will be relevant to future satellite programmes. It also includes the study and definition phases for some bilateral projects, such as the RADARSAT remote sensing programme which is being jointly studied with the Canadians.

As my hon. Friend is well aware, the Government's space activities involve several Departments and public bodies. I continue to chair the two committees which he established and which co-ordinate policy within Government and discuss policy issues with the space industry and user organisations. However, the Government took the decision earlier this year that there was a need to build on those co-ordinating arrangements, and establish a British National Space Centre to improve the development of space technology in the United Kingdom and to co-ordinate policy more effectively.

A growing range of users of space services is spread across Government, academic institutions and all types of industry. As they have become more aware of the benefits offered to them by space, it has become more important to establish a single focus to which they can turn for advice and technical support. We hope that they will seek to influence the programmes of the centre by making their own financial contributions. Our aim is to improve the use of public resources, and I believe that one of the most effective ways in which we can be sure of achieving this aim is to invite industry to play a major role within the centre. Detailed discussions are taking place, and I hope to be ready to make an announcement in September.

The establishment of a National Space Centre does not signal a new direction in space policy. Rather, it emphasises the Government's commitment to the development of space technology for industrial, scientific and defence purposes. ESA will remain the cornerstone of our civil space activities and I left my colleagues at the Rome Council in no doubt about Britain's continuing role in Europe and our determination to play a major role in space activities.

My hon. Friend referred to direct broadcasting by satellite. Having supported the development of the necessary technology, the Government's view remains that the introduction of an operational direct satellite broadcasting system in the United Kingdom should be carried out as a purely commercial venture. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has received a representation from the shadow Broadcasting Board on the various feasibility studies that have been undertaken, and I expect his response to be announced soon. In view of that, my hon. Friend would not expect or wish me to go further now.

Even at this relatively late hour, I would like to congratulate my hon. Friend on the timely way in which he has brought this subject to the attention of the House. Britain's involvement in space is a success. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) for his support. This debate has allowed us to give the industry the public recognition which it richly deserves.

Silloth (Travel-to-work Area)

10.7 pm

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for scheduling the Adjournment debates today to slot in an extra one, which has given me the opportunity to raise this matter. I am grateful for the help of your office, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment for cutting short an engagement to reply to the debate.

After a debate on space exploration, we must come down to the problems of Silloth on Solway, in my constituency. However, this is an important subject to me and to many of my constituents. In 1983 and 1984, the Department of Employment carried out a review of travel-to-work areas. The review used data about travel-to-work patterns from the 1981 census of population, and the results were published on 16 July 1984. The new travel-to-work areas and the wards in them make up the building blocks for the revised map of assisted areas published by the Department of Trade and Industry.

In making the calculations, the Department of Employment has made a fundamental error in assigning Silloth on Solway to the Carlisle travel-to-work area instead of the Workington travel-to-work area. To prove that point, I hope to show my hon. Friend that the new travel-to-work formula, based on a random 10 per cent. sample of the population, can go dangerously astray when dealing with such a small sample. In addition, I shall show from the evidence collected from main employers in the area that the majority of the work force in Silloth are Silloth-based and Workington-based rather than Carlisle-based.

It is necessary to understand how travel-to-work areas are defined and how individual electoral wards, which may be 50 or 100 miles apart, are allocated to them. The Department admits that there is no one theoretically correct algorithm for grouping areas in this way. Nevertheless, it has adopted a formula which is described simply as the commuting links formula. Algebraically, that formula is described as

$$\frac{Fa.b}{Ra} \cdot \frac{Fa.b}{Wb} + \frac{Fb.a}{Rb} \cdot \frac{Fb.a}{Wa}$$

Fa.b is the number of journeys to work from area A to area B, Ra is the number of workers who live in area A, and Wa is the number of people who work in area A.

That is sufficient to deter most people from querying whether the Department of Employment has it right. Fortunately, the Employment Gazette described how the formula and algorithm were used in practice. The algorithm used to arrive at travel-to-work areas consisted of five stages. Since my hon. Friend knows all those stages, I will not go through them, except to say that I believe that it was at the fifth stage that the Department made the fundamental error over Silloth on Solway.

If Silloth on Solway was allocated to a TTWA on its merits, it would certainly be associated with Workington on the west coast. However, wards are considered not on their own, but in relation to the commuting links with the next door ward. To the east of Silloth ward lies Waver ward, a large rural area stretching well over to the east near to the Wigton wards. Wigton, naturally and rightly, has close commuting links with Carlisle TTWA, and is assigned to that. Because most of the rural population, particularly in the eastern part of Waver ward, has, after Carlisle, the closest commuting links with Wigton, Waver ward has been assigned to Carlisle TTWA.

The Department has got Silloth wrong because the industrial estate in Silloth on Solway is technically a few hundred yards within the Waver ward boundary. Most people know it as Silloth airfield industrial estate, and know that it is an integral part of Silloth town, so much so that the vast majority of workers in the factories there come from Silloth. Nevertheless, it completely distorts the figures because technically all the workers from Silloth commute daily to Waver ward a few hundred yards away. That is because Waver ward has been dragged inexorably towards Wigton, which has links with Carlisle, so Silloth is also shown to have the closest commuting links with Waver ward, and is technically also allocated to Carlisle. A study of a map would demonstrate this much more clearly than my explanation.

We thus have the anomaly of a large rural ward such as Waver covering 40 or 50 square miles, not densely populated, but with a majority of people in the eastern part looking to Wigton and Carlisle for their natural commuting links, while tucked away in a small corner on the western extremity of the ward is the industrial estate of Silloth, which then gives a totally wrong loading to the commuting links formula.

As one of the factors governing the choice of algorithm was its ability to produce contiguous areas, the geographic position of Silloth, bounded by the sea on one side and on the other three sides by Waver ward, must mean that it is extremely unlikely that Silloth will be allocated to a different TTWA from the one to which Waver is allocated. This view is confirmed by the travel-to-work patterns.

On the basis of the figures given in answer to my parliamentary question of 15 April 1985, the approximate commuting link factor between Silloth and Waver, based on those in employment only, is 0·07, which is much stronger than any of the factors given in answer to my parliamentary question of 30 April when I asked:

"what was the value of the calculations of the measure commuting links formula for (a) Silloth ward and the wards 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 13 of Carlisle . . . area". — [Official Report, 30 April 1985; Vol. 78, c. 106-7.]

The answer was 0·00702. The factor between Silloth and Aspatria and Ellen wards was 0·00009, and the factor between Silloth and Castle, Dalton, Netherhall, Northside, St. Michael's, Stainburn and Westfield wards was 0·00010. I also asked about the factor between Waver ward and Wampool and Wigton wards, to which the answer was 0·00014. Between Waver ward and Aspatria and Ellen wards, it was 0·00006, and between Castle, Dalton, Netherhall, St. Michael's, Stainburn and Westfield wards, it was 0·0. If one studies this carefully, it can thus be seen that there is a very strong commuting link factor between Silloth and Waver, which everybody knew without the necessity for the formula which I have described. Thus any argument I make to my hon. Friend that Silloth has been wrongly allocated must also include consideration of Waver ward. The evidence from the census for allocating Silloth and Waver to Carlisle was very slight.

The crucial point is that the commuting factor between Silloth and Waver was 0·07. However, the commuting factor between Waver and Aspatria and Ellen was 0·00006. The commuting link between Waver and Wampool and Wigton was 0·00014. On those grounds alone, Waver was allocated to Wampool and Wigton, which thus had a stronger commuting link by a figure as splendid and as large as 0·00008. That is an incredibly small difference. I estimate that it could represent fewer than 10 journeys in each direction. On that basis alone, Waver was allocated to Wampool and Wigton. The travel-to-work patterns are based on a random 10 per cent. sample of census forms. Thus there could be a number of people commuting from Waver to Aspatria without that being reflected in the sample.

Let us suppose that the true number of journeys from Waver to Aspatria and Ellen was 10. There is roughly a 35 per cent. chance that none of the forms mentioning those journeys would appear in the sample. Similarly, if the actual number of journeys was 20 or 30, there would be probabilities of 12 per cent. and 4 per cent. respectively, but the sample would still suggest that there were no journeys.

If the number of journeys from Waver to Aspatria and Ellen had been 10 rather than zero, the commuting link factor would have been 0·00016—a stronger link than between Waver and Wampool and Wigton. Therefore, the allocation of Waver to the Wampool and Wigton Proto travel-to-work area may have depended on the random selection or otherwise of a single census form.

Because I believe that a random 10 per cent. sample is far too dangerously low a formula to use in a sparsely populated rural area, I conducted my own survey of the five major firms that account for most employment in the Silloth area. My sample shows a very different pattern of commuting from that shown in the 1981 census. However, in some respects our figures agree, which shows that my sample is based on valid criteria. The 1981 census identified 670 people working in Silloth; my sample of five firms four years later identified 700. The 1981 census identified 440 of those workers resident in Silloth. My sample identified 380. The remaining 60 will be made up of employees of smaller firms which I did not survey. Our figures are so close that no one can argue that my survey is inaccurate.

However, the figures show a different result for those commuting into Silloth from other areas. The random 10 per cent. sample of the 1981 census suggested that 110 of the Silloth workers commuted from the Carlisle TTWA and only 40 from Workington. My comprehensive survey, carried out in 1985, showed that only 84 commuted from Carlisle and 236 from Workington. Those are not minor statistical aberrations — they are glaring differences between the figures.

Let me read to the House extracts from letters I have received from the managing directors of the various firms concerned. One firm employing 55 workers states:

"Our staff locations done in a recent survey are as follows — Silloth 21, Maryport 11, Aspatria 11, Wigton 6, Abbeytown 6. 90 per cent. of our staff, therefore, come from the Maryport catchment area."

That managing director goes on to make the point I have endeavoured to make. He says:

"Firstly, all the factories on this airfield of which we are one are not in the Silloth Parish area and are included in the Waver District. The Waver area is allied to Wigton which is allied to Carlisle. With our intimate knowledge of Silloth we can only assume that all people travelling to Silloth Aerodrome and to British Sidac in Wigton are counted as travelling to Carlisle area. In our experience of employing people, our catchment area covers Maryport District in nearly every case. Applications for jobs come overwhelmingly from the Maryport area. We have had hundreds of applications and have never, ever had an application from Carlisle."

All the other four firms make the same point. One states:

"Total number employed 149. From Silloth 93. From Carlisle 12. From Workington 44."

I do not need an algebraic formula to determine where the strongest commuting links are in that case.

The fifth major employer in my survey gave me this information:

"Total number of staff employed 184. Number from Silloth 46. Number travelling from Carlisle TTWA 22 and number travelling from Workington 116."

The managing director went on to state:

"As you can see from these figures, there is no doubt in my mind that in the case of our company we are providing a valuable service to the Workington TTWA, which has a high level of unemployment, especially in the non-skilled working area which we are mainly employing. We run transport daily, at our cost, from Workington via Maryport to the works and it is clear from the figures that we draw mainly on this area for our labour force."

The 1981 census and my survey show that 60 per cent. of those working in Silloth reside in Silloth. A random 10 per cent. sample from the 1981 census shows that 16 per cent. of those working in Silloth travel from the Carlisle area, and on that basis—a basis of 16 per cent.—the Department of Employment has allocated Silloth to the Carlisle TTWA.

That would be a poor basis on which to make an allocation even if the figure was correct, but I submit that the figure is grossly inaccurate. My comprehensive survey shows that only 12 per cent. of workers in Silloth have commuting links with Carlisle. For Workington, the random 10 per cent. sample shows that only 5 per cent. of the Silloth workers have commuting links with Workington.

However, the correct figure, as evident from my survey, is 34 per cent. There is no doubt that a serious error has been made, and I know that when my hon. Friend has had a chance to read my speech in Hansard tomorrow, and study the figures for himself, he will inevitably come to the same conclusion.

I do not expect the Minister to give me an instant answer to the problem I have presented him with tonight. He will have seen from my parliamentary questions that it has taken me eight months of painstaking research to discover the fault in the algorithm and the formula. When confronted with it is difficult for an ordinary hon. Member, without the facilities at the disposal of my hon. Friend, to know what is the correct answer. In this case, I did not even know the correct questions.

I have not mentioned the effect of this error. I have not dwelt on it because it has been my sole intention to prove that the Department has made a mistake in the formula calculations, rather than to recite the catalogue of disaster which will befall the Silloth area if this eror is not corrected. The Minister will know that I am referring to the loss of assisted area status, and I urge him to look at the map and see the isolated and difficult position in which Silloth finds itself. The managing director of one firm said to me:

"The consequent loss of regional development status is quite serious to us, given the fact that a lot of the investment in our company has been made possible by regional grants, and should these be lost, the long-term effects due to the high transportation costs of our product will be quite serious."

Another firm said:

"We brought our business from London because of the regional assistance afforded in the area and the high quality of staff available. If the incentives are taken away, then why come?"

Another firm stated:

"Currently we have proposals pending, with our parent company overseas, for large capital expenditure. The receipt of approval for this expenditure. The receipt of approval from this expenditure and the securing of jobs that this will affect could be heavily dependent on the availability of grant facilities. Currenly, our overseas facilities, with their advantageous tax and grant situations, have received approval for their expenditure, which are already well advanced in action. The loss of our regional grant status could incur unfavourable comparisons and weaken the case for our 1985 capital programme, as well as in subsequent years."

I know that that is not the province of my hon. Friend, but he knows that the Department of Trade and Industry map for regional assistance is based on the figures produced by his Department for TTWAs. In my constituency, the largest in England, with 1,250 square miles. I can find many areas that I would dearly like to see quality for assisted area status, but I am restricting my request only to the town of Silloth on Solway, and for one reason only, and that is because it has been erroneously removed from the Workington TTWA and allocated to Carlisle.

I know that my hon. Friend, with his natural sense of justice and fairness, will want to correct that mistake as soon as possible. I will gladly send him the file and all the papers, and I look forward to a favourable response, if not in his reply tonight, at least when he has had a chance to study the case personally.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on the way in which he has deployed his case and for using 18 minutes of the time of the House in an excellent way. He has shown by his persistence that the electorate within his constituency were right to have him as their representative following a great by-election. Sadly I was not able to participate, but I enjoyed taking part in the by-election at Workington in a previous Parliament. I know how much the area matters to those who live in it and I am aware that strong representation is important to them. I am only sorry that there are no representatives from the alliance or Labour parties to participate in the debate. I think that my hon. Friend has made up for their absence.

I am glad that there is common ground that the first four stages of deciding travel-to-work areas are recognised as being completely satisfactory. My hon. Friend's arguments were directed to the fifth stage. I cannot give him any hope of change tonight. However, I shall ensure that all his arguments are studied seriously. He will know from a parliamentary answer given to him on 26 April that there has been only one change in the travel-to-work areas. It took place in an area some way away from Silloth on Solway and involved a change between the Swansea and Llanelli areas. That was based on a revision in the 1981 census of population data. I cannot tell my hon. Friend that there will be a change following his representations, but if there is one it will be because of his persistence and expertise.

The House may be confused by my hon. Friend's description of the commuting links formula. It may help if I spell it out in English. Equation two is the measure of commuting link between two wards calculated as the square of the number of journeys from ward 1 to ward 2 divided by the product of the number of workers living in ward 1 and the number of people working in ward 2 plus the square of the number of journeys from ward 2 to ward 1 divided by the product of the number of workers living in ward 2 and the number of people working in ward 1.

Anyone who has a chance of studying the occasional supplement No. 3 of the Employment Gazette, September 1984, volume 92, No. 9, on revised travel-to-work areas will recognise equation one, which I shall give to the House. It is the weighted flow between two wards calculated by scaling up the observed flows of people in each socio-economic group between those wards by the ratio of the number of unemployed of that socio-economic group in the first ward plus the number of people of that socio-economic group working in the first ward to the number of people of that socio-economic group working in that ward. We do that for each socio-economic group.

If this is common ground and if you are still with us, Mr. Speaker, we have isolated the issues. My hon. Friend rightly drew attention to the difficulty of trying to compare the significance of a link to two decimal places compared with others to five decimal places. The House will be grateful for his algebraic and mathematical expertise. He has made the point that this issue matters a great deal to those in the Silloth area. Assisted area status matters. There are always boundary problems and he has recognised that he could have made a case—perhaps not quite so strongly — for other wards within his constituency. That is why we in the Department take these concerns seriously.

My Department has given many detailed answers to questions from my hon. Friend. We have done that, not always with delight because a fair amount of work is involved, because we recognise that it is right for him to be persistent and it is right for us to produce justifications. If it turns out that there is no justification to be given, it is for us to say so openly. I am not prepared to do that to my hon. Friend tonight even in face of the eloquence with which he advanced his case.

In essence, my hon. Friend is saying that nothing "propinqs" like propinquity. It is the closeness between wards that matters. To put it in plain English, is the airfield in the right ward? If the airfield had been in a different ward, the issue might have been far clearer from the beginning and there would not have been a chance of a 10 per cent. sample not carrying the confidence that might otherwise be attached to it. In general, a 10 per cent. sample carries a great deal of confidence and it can be said that one can rely upon it. My hon. Friend has advanced the argument that the exclusion of one census form in the 10 per cent. sample on which his case is based might have made a massive difference for those in the Silloth on Solway area. I think that I have summarised his case pretty accurately.

I reiterate my thanks to my hon. Friend for the way in which he has brought forward his contentions. If I were one of his constituents, I should be confident that no one could have done it better. He has presented his arguments with good humour but with great expertise. I assure my hon. Friend that either I or my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), will write to him when we have had a chance of studying statistics and receiving advice from those who went further than my A-level in mathematics.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Father of the House

Mr. Speaker: On this day 40 years ago, the Father of the House—the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan)—came here for the first time. I am sure that the whole House would wish to congratulate him and to wish him well in the years to come.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Falklands War (Peace Proposals)

9.35 am

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, in business questions after I had left the Chamber, the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) raised a point of order, which is reported in column 1313 of the Official Report, relating in part to a question that I had asked the Prime Minister, in column 1303.

May I take the opportunity of tendering to the right hon. Gentleman my apologies for any embarrassment that my question may have caused him? I apologise also if he feels that paragraphs 5.14 to 5.27 of the minority report in my name are less complete and explicit than they could have been.

The evidence submitted by the Foreign Office, which is published on page 133 of that report, shows the great efforts that the right hon. Gentleman was making during that period. I was only too well aware of these, as I was present in the House at 11 am on Friday 7 May 1982 when he reported to the House on the results of those strenuous efforts in Washington and New York.

Electrical Substations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wakeham.]

9.36 am

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Mr. Speaker has commented on what happened 40 years ago today. I am privileged to be a Member of the House with my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). When he entered the House 40 years ago with the return of a Labour Government, there was massive work to be done. The troops came home and realised the mess that the nation was in. There were many problems to be sorted out.

My right hon. Friend is with us today. I pay tribute to the marvellous work that the Labour Government did during that difficult period. I do not doubt that my right hon. Friend will remember that day this morning. After checking wherever one can check these matters, I think that I am correct in saying that he is the only Prime Minister who has become Father of the House. He has been a true and faithful servant to all his constituents, the nation and the world.

Behind every great man there is usually a great woman. I refer to Audrey, my right hon. Friend's wife, who has done sterling work in the community. Without her, I do not think that my right hon. Friend could have achieved what he has.

I now sound a serious note. My constituency of Ashfield in Nottinghamshire contains a place called Selston. That is not a village or a town—it is something in between. Many people live in that fairly large area. On the evening of Saturday 13 July 1985, three youngsters —two 11-year-olds and a nine-year-old—climbed into an electrical substation on the housing estate. Apparently, youngsters do that fairly regularly. The children find cigarettes and matches and they go into the substation to pick off bits of the compound that is used for sealing the units. If the compound is running down the transformers, it means that there is a leakage of some sort, because the compound is on the inside and the units are sealed.

The units carry about 11,000 volts. I understand that for some years youngsters have put their hands into the transformers to get "tickled", as they call it. On 13 July, two 11-year-old boys went into the substation. One of them put his hand in and there was an explosion. That boy died the next day, suffering 85 per cent. burns over the whole of his body. The other boy, who went to the Nottingham city hospital burns unit, suffered 55 to 60 per cent. burns and died the following Wednesday in that unit. It was a terrible tragedy and I feel it my duty to bring it to the attention of the House.

There are, of course, regulations and there is an inspectorate. The authority is the East Midlands electricity board. I understand that the substations are examined fairly regularly, but when incidents of this sort happen it is obvious that something is gravely wrong.

There are 645 similar transformers in the county of Nottingham and nationwide there are over 11,000. Not long ago, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in your own county of Sussex, a lad was killed doing the same thing, and the electricity board at that time promised to take action so that it could not happen again. But nothing has been done, the regulations have not been tightened up, and there have been two fatalities in my constituency.

[Mr. Frank Haynes]

It is disturbing to find that there is very easy access to many electrical substations. The electricity boards are making large profits and should be able to earmark funds for the purpose of safeguarding substations.

The wall around the substation where the tragedy occurred is 6ft high. There is no top on it. There are two doors at the front. The danger notice is on the front of the door. Around the outer perimeter of the 6ft wall is a small fence made with chicken wire. The youngsters were able to stand on the fence, climb over the wall and gain entry to the substation.

The Evening Post took photographs of one area in the city of Nottingham, Clifton, in which there are several substations. The photographs show clearly what is wrong with them. One of the substations is totally encased and there is no possible access to it unless the doors are open, but there is easy access to the others. As can be seen from the photographs, one is insecure—children can crawl under the fence. Another has a huge hole in the fence. In another there is graffiti on the substation walls, showing that someone has been in there.

The district manager of the East Midlands electricity board at Ilkeston, who is responsible for the area, says that the transformer and switchgear are contained in steel and are completely safe, but there is a pitch running down them, clearly showing that something is wrong. The board suggests that that is because people have tampered with the equipment. It is clear that the substations are not vandal-proof, and I should have thought that in 1985 it would be possible, with proper research, to make substations safe.

I understand that the district manager has also said that there are no laws with regard to fencing. Surely it is time that the Central Electricity Generating Board and the Department of Energy looked seriously at the situation.

I discussed the problem last night with my hon. Friends the Members for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) and for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). They assure me that they have similar problems with substations in their constituencies. If the problem exists in places as far apart as Nottinghamshire in the Midlands, Jarrow in the north-east, and Ogmore in south Wales, the Department and the CEGB have a considerable task to put the matter right.

In rural areas the substations are not cordoned off. We know what kids will do; we have all been kids ourselves. They get up to all sorts of things, but when I was young tragedies of this sort did not happen. I met the parents of the boys and they were in a terrible state of grief. Last Sunday afternoon, on the estate where they live, the field was packed and the parents made it clear to me that they wished me to go down to the House of Commons and do something about the problem. They are asking for all substations to be made safe, no matter what the cost. We cannot put a price on life and we all know that the money is available to overcome the problem.

We also want to know what the powers that be will do about the problem. I hope that the Minister can give me, the House, parents on that estate and parents nationwide an assurance that they will do something with a view to overcoming tragedies such as the one that we had on 13 July in Selston, Nottinghamshire. We want something done so that such a tragedy never happens again.

I remember, as I am sure does my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, a chap during the second world war. His name was General MacArthur. He often issued orders. He said, " I want action on this day." That is what I and my constituents are looking for.

I found that the city of Nottingham spends £10,000 a month maintaining and repairing the substations. Multiplied by 12, that amounts to £120,000 a year. The city council says that it spends that money just to stand still and that no progress is made because no sooner has it done the repairs than the position is back to where it was. That is throwing money away.

The Government say that money should be spent wisely. I agree with that. I hope that I spend the money in my pocket wisely. We want the electricity authority and the Department of Energy to spend their money wisely.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): It is our money.

Mr. Haynes: I accept what my hon. Friend says. It is our money. It is the taxpayers' money, and it should be spent wisely in their interests. Something must be done about the problem. I hope that the Minister will satisfy me this morning that something will be done.

The authorities say that, because of vandalism, they are running to stand still. That is not good enough when so much public money is being spent. I agree that a fair amount of cash is needed, but the problem must be overcome. That is why I applied to Mr. Speaker for this debate. I hope that what I have said has been listened to. I hope that the nation notes the fact that the Department of Energy is full of money. It has all the North sea oil revenues and it receives a great deal of money from the electricity consumer. The Department of Energy and the CEGB have a responsibility. I hope that those departments will respond to this morning's serious appeal so that we never again have such a tragedy anywhere in the United Kingdom.

9.53 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alaistair Goodlad): I associate myself with what has been said by Mr. Speaker and by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) about the Father of the House. I am delighted that our debate this morning should be attended by that great House of Commons man.

This debate is about a subject of great seriousness. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having raised the matter. First, I must express my deepest sympathy with the parents and families of the victims of this tragic occurrence to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

On the early evening of Saturday 13 July two 11-year-old boys were in a substation at Selston. They were close to some of the equipment in that substation when there was an explosion which killed one boy outright and so severely injured the other that he died in hospital a few days later. The substation, which is in a housing estate, is what is known as a distribution substation where electricity at 11,000 volts is stepped down to low voltage for distribution to consumers. The main components were a transformer, a low voltage pillar and three interconnected 11,000 volts switches, and it was on the latter apparatus that the explosion occurred.

I shall answer as best I can what has been said by the hon. Gentleman, but I am sure that he will appreciate that investigations into the cause of the accident are continuing and that I should not wish to say anything that might be taken as being prejudicial to the coroner's inquest or to any other legal proceedings that might follow.

As the hon. Member will be aware, a preliminary inquest on the matter of identification was held on Thursday 18 July. There will, of course, be a full inquest later and the date of that is a matter for the coroner. The safety regulations applicable to such electricity substations are laid down in the Electricity Supply Regulations 1937, made under the Electricity (Supply) Acts 1882 to 1936. Regulation 9(a) provides that, where energy at high voltage is transformed, converted, regulated or otherwise controlled in substations or switch stations, including outdoor substations, such outdoor substations and outdoor switch stations shall (unless the apparatus is completely enclosed in a metal casing connected with earth, the apparatus also being connected with the system by armoured electric lines) be efficiently protected by fencing not less than eight feet in height or other means so as to prevent access to the electric lines and apparatus therein by any unauthorised person.

The apparatus in the Selston substation was what is known as metal-clad—that is, all the live electrical parts are enclosed within substantial metal covers and insulated to a very high standard. Although there was therefore no statutory requirement for it, the Selston high voltage equipment was in fact enclosed within a substantial brick wall, 6 ft. high, which was fitted with substantial and padlocked wooden doors. The area containing the substation was itself bounded by a fence about 4 ft. high, also with padlocked gates. A notice was fitted on the substation main gates warning of danger and giving details of how the electricity board staff could be contacted. The substation appears to have met in all respects the statutory requirements.

It appears that the explosion occurred in that part of the apparatus forming a link between two of the three 11,000 volts switches. That part of the equipment took the form of a horizontal cylinder, made from a strong alloy forging, 4½ in. long and about 15 in. in diameter which was 3 ft. from the ground. That cylinder appears for some reason to have failed to such an extent that it had been leaking the bitumen compound which formed the insulating material within the cylinder. As the bitumen leaked from the cylinder linking the two switches, the insulation level fell until the short circuit which caused the explosion occurred. All the electrical protection equipment operated properly to switch off all supplies to the substation when the explosion occurred. Detailed examination and tests of this equipment which simulated the electrical events of the previous day were undertaken on the following day and showed that the equipment was in good order and operating correctly.

It seems clear that the bitumen compound had been leaking from the cylinder, during the day time when temperatures are higher, on the day previous to the accident. Some of the local children were getting compound on that day from both the ground and that part of the switchgear where the explosion occurred the following day. It appears that several boys with quite large pieces of compound were seen locally on the day following the explosion. It appears that the two children were playing with this leaking bitumen inside the substation when the explosion occurred.

The cause of the original failure of the cylinder is not yet known and it would be wrong for me to speculate at this stage. All the relevant parts of the equipment are being examined by a specialised engineering laboratory, independent of the East Midlands electricity board, which is attached to a local power station.

All such substations, as the hon. Gentleman said, are regularly inspected by the East Midlands electricity board on a six-monthly basis, but may be visited more often for other reasons. The routine inspections require the signing of a pro-forma detailing any faults found following an examination of the apparatus in the substation, on the basis of a printed check list.

Two employees of the board had in fact carried out such a routine inspection of the substation on 31 May 1985 and their signed report of that inspection revealed the only faults in the substation as being the absence of some small labels. It is inconceivable that those employees would have missed leaked compound and the check list for the switchgear concerned particularly mentions that leakage must be checked for. The floor under that part of the equipment where the explosion occurred is fully open to view.

An electricity board employee was on the scene within half an hour of the explosion and one of the senior engineering inspectors from my Department went to the site on Tuesday 16 July before any significant change was made in the state of the equipment. The board quickly set up its own panel of inquiry which met on Friday 19 July and has met again since. The chairman of the investigating panel is from the board's headquarters and is thus not directly associated with the area in which the accident occurred, and the panel includes an independent safety officer from the Electricity Council.

The switchgear in the Selston substation is from a very well-known manufacturer, was made and installed in 1965, and is very substantial. There has never been a similar occurrence with equipment of this manufacture.

Planning permission is not required for such small substations. They must, however, because they supply ordinary premises at low voltage, be within about 300 yd of the furthest consumer fed from them. There are about 160,000 of that type of substation in England, Wales and Scotland and in the last 10 years there have been no other fatalities. In common with all electricity boards, the East Midlands electricity board makes great efforts to ensure that the public, and children in particular, are aware of the hazards associated with electricity. The board circulates all schools in its area with offers of safety visits, video literature and so on, and these efforts are usually intensified in early summer before the school holidays begin.

The technical operations of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales are governed by the Electricity Supply Regulations 1937, and regulation 38 requires area electricity boards to notify the Department of Energy of all those accidents on its works or circuits which have caused or were likely to have caused injury. The same regulation is followed by one which empowers the Department to investigate any accident or type of accident it wishes to. The East Midlands electricity board has complied with its obligations in that respect.

My engineering inspectorate examine carefully all such notifications made to it and make such visits and investigations of individual accidents as is appropriate. Therefore, this particular accident will be examined in detail by the Department to see whether the regulations have been observed and to identify whether the accident discloses any shortcomings in the regulations or in their application. My inspectors will have the benefit of the report from the board's own panel of inquiry.

All the accident notifications to the Department are collated and analyses are made with the object of detecting any trends to enable preventive action to be taken. These analyses go back many years and, for a variety of reasons, the incidence of accidents, fatalities and injuries on the electricity boards' equipment is in gradual but significant decline, and has been so over many years. The most important of the figures that come out of these analyses are published in the Secretary of State's annual reports to Parliament. Accidents in substations to members of the general public, which have resulted in fatality have amounted to six in the past 10 years. All of these took place in substations where, unlike at Selston, the conductors are in the open air, and which are therefore, under the regulations, surrounded with fences not less than 8ft in height. Most of those fatalities occurred after forcible entry and usually in the course of vandalism or attempted theft of equipment. Until this very tragic accident, there had been no fatalities in substations utilising metal-clad switchgear during that period.

There are more than 419,000 substations of all descriptions in the country. The number of injuries to the general public averages 14 per year, and include some falls and other minor matters. In general, the public are not subject to major or continuing hazards as a result of the existence of these installations.

My Department keeps the regulations under constant review and is at present undertaking a major update of the 1937 regulations as a whole. These will be the subject of widespread public consultation before being laid before the House in due course. I believe that experience to date does not indicate any need for radical change to those parts of the regulations applying to substations containing metal-clad switchgear, which have an extremely good safety record. None the less, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that should the results of the investigation into this accident indicate that changes to the regulations are required——

Mr. Haynes: The Minister referred to the distance between the substations and neighbouring residential property. The Selston substation is almost on top of neighbouring property. It must be outside the regulations. Perhaps the substation was there first and the property built later. Nevertheless, it is almost on top of the property.

I am listening carefully to the Minister's promise to examine the regulations closely to determine whether they need to be tightened. However, I am not quite happy with what he has said, although I appreciate that he has not finished yet. I make an application, here today, for a public inquiry into the incident. I did not want to make that point, but the Minister's remarks have drawn me to do so.

Mr. Goodlad: The hon. Gentleman's point about the location of the substation in relation to the houses will be taken into account in the investigation and the review.

By virtue of section 66 of the Electricity Act 1947, I have the power to cause an inquiry to be held in any case where I deem it advisable to do so, in connection with any matter arising under the electricity supply legislation. In the light of what the hon. Gentleman has said, of the inquiries being carried out by the board and by my engineering inspectorate, and of the verdict of the coroner's inquest, I shall consider whether a public inquiry would be desirable. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman in due course.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter in the House today because it is right that this very tragic matter should be thoroughly examined to see what lessons—which might go towards preventing similar occurrences—might be learned——

Mr. Haynes: A number of points are being drawn out because of what the Minister is saying. Police often go into schools to educate children about crime. For example, they tell them never to accept things from or go away with strangers. Does the Department issue instructions to the Central Electricity Generating Board and its regions to go into schools to educate children about the dangers of the substations, and tell them that they must keep away from them? That point should be seriously considered, as it would help to overcome the problem. As I said earlier, children will be children, so we must educate them to stay clear of such places.

Mr. Goodlad: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. As I have said, electricity boards undertake a substantial programme of education in schools and provide demonstrations about electricity and its dangers. It is an enterprise in which everybody should join because there are clearly dangers in electricity. However, on the whole, I am confident that the regulations, which are subject to review, are adequate and that the practices are adequate as well.

Child Abuse

10.10 am

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I shall not have to start by facing the difficulties faced by Lord Shaftesbury in 1875 when he wrote to a friend who was profoundly concerned about the welfare of children and said:

"The evils you state are enormous and indisputable, but they are of so private, internal and domestic a character as to be beyond the reach of legislation and the subject would not, I think, be entertained in either house of Parliament."

I am pleased to have this opportunity to talk about child abuse. It has been estimated that more than one child dies every week at the hands of its parents or guardians, and that every year perhaps 50,000 others suffer lesser deaths —physical cruelty, mental torture, gross neglect, sexual abuse or severe emotional starvation within their families.

None of us can fail to experience a strong emotional reaction to the recent cases of child abuse and death which have been so widely reported. There have been errors of judgment and it is essential that lessons be learnt from those. Rather than simply adding to the sensationalistic and censorious responses to these recent appalling tragedies, for which simplistic solutions are too often proposed and social workers are more often than not used as whipping boys, I should like to try to redress the balance and see the problem of child abuse in a clearer context.

Sadly, there is certainly nothing new about child abuse and neglect. The use of pathological terms to describe its roots, causes and effects and the media's preoccupation with horrific cases should not obscure its long-standing nature or delude us into thinking that its incidence and characteristics are any different now from what has been described in literature over the years. Descriptions of barbarous treatment are widespread in literature and popular culture. There are frequent tales of infanticide, ritual sacrifice, mutilation, starvation, flogging and exploitation. It is only relatively recently that a child has been thought to have any right at all not to be abused or neglected.

I hope that this is not an area in which Members will advocate a return to Victorian values. In Victorian times children did not get a particularly good deal, as can be seen from graphic accounts in novels by Dickens and others. By 1822 there were laws for the protection of animals, but it was not until 1889 that, with the first children's charter, neglect and cruelty to children became illegal. The activity of baby farming where children faced a lingering death from starvation was notorious.

I should like to pay tribute to the work of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, founded in 1884. Like so many other organisations, it was founded by philanthropists responding to need as they saw it. In its 100 years over 9 million children have been helped. The society started with a policy of removing children from their homes and when necessary prosecuting their parents, but increasingly it tried to work with families in an attempt to keep children at home. At the turn of the century its enlightened founder, Benjamin Waugh, said:

"It is better to remove evil from the home than remove the child."

We still face precisely the same issue when dealing with child abuse.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I hope my hon. Friend will allow me to associate myself with her remarks about the valuable work of the NSPCC. She has drawn attention to the work done by its field workers and also to the work that it does centrally and to its resources, such as the valuable Sainsbury library.

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend for endorsing my remarks. The NSPCC has constantly moved ahead and has pioneered work and performed the ideal role of a voluntary body of embarking on experimental and innovative work, maintaining statistics, expanding research and developing social work services. It also influences legislation and is increasingly involved in educational work.

The one job for which nobody has training is parenthood. Frequently in cases of child abuse we find poorly skilled parents with remarkably disadvantaged backgrounds who are quite unprepared for the demands and pressures that a child places upon them. Many hope that a child will be source of love for them, and are quite unprepared for long days and nights tending difficult children with demanding behaviour. When the strains and stresses on the rest of their life build up, too frequently it is the child who is the butt of their anger.

The majority of child abuse cases involve children under five, although there are increasing numbers of cases involving children over 10; about one child in four is over 10 at the time of the abuse. Apart from physical injury, they fall into categories of failure to thrive, sexual abuse, which is causing increasing concern, neglect, and emotional abuse. Fewer than half live with both their natural parents. The parents are more likely to be unemployed, and nearly two thirds are in receipt of supplementary benefit.

A significant number of the parents have criminal records, nearly half the men, and one in five of the women, according to recent NSPCC research, and a large number of the criminal records relate to violent offences. This raises the issue of the extent to which criminal records should be available to those responsible for child placement. There are many background stress factors on the families. They include marital discord in virtually half the cases, unemployment, and financial problems, but many parents also complain of difficulties with the children, saying that the child is behaving badly.

Significantly, many parents have an unrealistic expectation of how the child should behave, so that when it behaves badly the parent takes it as a personal rejection. Many complain of being socially isolated. Heavy drinking is a factor in about one in five cases, and another factor is a parent with a psychiatric history. Frequently, parents have had experience of being in care and, significantly, of being battered themselves.

It is helpful to build up background information, but it is naive to think that by building up such information one can predict precisely where incidents will occur, because they are profoundly multifaceted. We know of the disasters and the problems, and we know when a child loses its life. Serious injuries and fatalities are in decline. Social workers and public authorities cannot advertise successes. The confidentiality of the parents and children involved mean that they are protected and, as a result, the public always receive a jaundiced picture.

Social workers are particularly vulnerable. Widespread variations in practice exist and one disaster inevitably results in social workers being pilloried. We had a recent example in the press of a lady with seven broken ribs being sent home from hospital, an injury which she sustained in a car accident. The lady later died, but this did not result in a letter from the DHSS advising doctors to X-ray motor accident victims. One can imagine the indignation of the medical profession if this one clear case of bad practice had been used as an example for guidelines.

Few people appreciate the complexity of the job that a social worker has to do. Such a worker has to make life and death decisions, he or she has to decide whether or not to place a child on the child abuse register, whether or not to seek a care or supervision order or whether to go for wardship. The social worker has to decide whether or not the child should be removed from its home and if it should be fostered or adopted, or whether rehabilitation should be attempted. All this uncertainty causes delays, stress on the parents and stress on the child. Indecision is often one of the worst eventualities for a child. But throughout this, social workers have to do all that they can to maintain the trust of the parents.

Too often, child care legislation results from some appalling incident. It is interesting that the Curtis report in the 1940s resulted from a case where a child was killed when in the care of foster parents. It resulted in the setting up of the children's departments. In 1973 Maria Colwell died at the age of seven, and the inquiry report into the circumstances of her care was published a year later. Currently there is the Jasmine Beckford case, when again a child was returned from foster parents to a home with a history of violence.

It would be unfortunate if such a case resulted in widespread over-reaction. Social workers are always having to act according to the whims of public pressure. In recent months we have had a great outcry in the media about social workers removing too many children from their families, suggesting that this is oppressive and a sign of the totalitarian state, and that it is not right for children to be brought away from their natural parents. The Family Rights Group has been particularly active in advocating this view.

It would be sad now if we had a widescale over-reaction, as many feel we did after Maria Colwell, where magistrates, social workers and others are so afraid of being pilloried in the press that they over-reacted. We could safely take hundreds and thousands of children into care to lead a rather sterilised life, doing the best that could be done. But it must be right to try as hard as possible to leave a child with the family, with the proviso that if rehabilitation does not work a brave and firm decision must be made because the child needs a secure and predictable future.

We have had other fashions and trends, some more sinister than others. In some of the more Left-wing areas we have recently faced an obsession with a kind of anti-racism where, in cases of black children especially, social workers were interrogated if they decided that they should be removed from their homes. This is profoundly unhelpful to all families and an insult to the overwhelming majority of caring families from ethnic minorities, suggesting that somehow they need a different standard of care. It is especially incensing when some of the more Left-wing despots try to interfere with professional social work practice in this way and are then often the first to point the finger at social workers and condemn them when cases go wrong.

The social worker has a duty to his local authority, and that points in two profoundly opposite ways. The Children and Young Persons Act 1969 requires that "children shown to be at risk are protected."

The Child Care Act 1980 lays

"a duty on a local authority to work to prevent children having to go into care whenever possible."

Somehow, social workers have to find a way down the middle.

I welcome the recent consultative paper issued by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary on child abuse inquiries, trying to standardise the way in which inquiries are held. It is essential to hold such an inquiry speedily as soon as there has been an incident. The appalling cost of inquiries at present—up to £500,000 in one case—simply to have the local authority go through much of the same information that is gone through in the court case is unhelpful. We need a standardised way of learning from mistakes, adopting a similar approach to all inquiries so that comparisons can be made.

The British Association of Social Workers has been working for many months on policy papers for codes of practice in cases of child abuse, trying to look long term at the issues involved rather than simply responding to a crisis.

The emphasis laid by all is on the need for training. It was perhaps simplistic to think that a generic social worker could be produced after perhaps one year's training. Increasingly what is required is post-qualifying experience. The Seebohm idea of one front door so that families did not have to go to a variety of agencies is laudable, but to deal with the very difficult issues involved in child abuse must require post-qualifying training and experience.

In many ways, the probation service handles its training better. There is a major problem in that social workers do not receive mandatory awards. They go on their initial training as a result of secondment. It has been tentatively suggested that this makes it particularly difficult for colleges to fail CQSW students who are on secondment. This is an issue which I would like to see looked at further.

Above all, basic training must include a practical understanding and appreciation of child development. In most of the cases that have arisen the child has suffered considerable weight loss, which is one of the first signs of unhappiness and emotional distress. It is essential that some of this knowledge which health visitors have is understood more widely by social workers.

There is also the factor emphasised in the Maria Colwell report that the ability to communicate with children alone is essential. It is not possible to work only through the parents. Direct contact must be made with the child. Again I welcome the letter from the chief inspector of the Social Services Inspectorate to all authorities emphasising the need actually to see the child. I am constantly struck by the number of cases where a huge number of visits have been made but the child has not actually been seen. The child needs to be seen.

In my view, consideration should be given to adding a little more to the obligations of a family whose child is put on the child abuse register. That parent, for instance, might be entitled to a written statement in the way that in court an accused person who is refused bail is given a written statement of the reasons. Is it unreasonable for the parents whose child is placed on the child abuse register to have a written statement explaining their obligations and what is expected of them? Amongst the ideas that I suggest is, first, that for a child who is not attending a day nursery there should be regular medical inspections. Seeing a child unclothed at regular intervals is a vital ingredient. It is very hard for a social worker visiting a family to ask a child to remove its clothes. That needs to be done by a member of the medical profession.

There should also be an obligation on the parent to inform the local authority or the person responsible of any change in the location of the child. Frequently a disaster has been preceded by a change in the home circumstances —either the child has gone to live with someone else or there has been another significant change at home. Frequently it is a change which might not initially give rise to concern. For example, a father finding a job may to the uninitiated seem to be a good move, but it may mean that the mother is more isolated and more lonely, and the child is more at risk. It is vital for any change in circumstances to be investigated and considered.

Similarly, there is an impact on a family if there are changes in its support team. If a family aide leaves, or if a health visitor leaves, it is essential to recognise the significance and the impact that it may have on the child.

It is essential for management training to be introduced for the social work organisations. Social work departments are recent creations. There is no reason to despair—they have come a long way in a short time — but good management training is vital.

It is also important to have a qualified, experienced worker in each authority responsible for consulting on child abuse cases. The person who holds the child abuse register should not be an unqualified clerical assistant. It is essential to have someone who can give guidance and advice and weigh up information coming in to him.

I wish to spend a few moments discussing the input of the multi-disciplinary team. Children live in an environment in which their schools, their doctors, their health visitors, their local policemen — all sorts of people—have a part to play. A multi-disciplinary team is vital for dealing with cases of child abuse. However, it needs to be practical. It must know who is the chairman and what decisions have been reached. It cannot be just an exchange of hunch, intuition, feeling and suspicion. It must be a practical body which sets out clearly categorised points for action. Moreover, when the points for action have been established, there must be a specific recommendation about the action that needs to be taken if something goes wrong. It is easy enough to prescribe a recipe, but it is not so easy when one finds that the child is not there when one knocks at the door. To whom does one turn then? All of these eventualities need to be clarified.

The general practitioner has a particularly important role to play, but he does not always face up to this role. A recent research project on multi-disciplinary teams suggested that the general practitioner turns up only at 10 per cent. of the conferences to which he has been invited. The general practitioner's contribution is important. In the Maria Colwell case there was comment about the failure of the general practitioner to note the signs of child abuse. The Short report on children in care also referred to the vital role of the general practitioner and his reluctance sometimes to report suspected abuse by parents who are also his patients. A child has a right not to be abused. When he is making up his mind, that should be the overriding concern of the doctor. The child is his patient, too.

Teachers see a great deal of children when they are at school, but frequently they are remarkably unaware of the signs of child abuse. So the training of teachers is also important. A child who is reluctant to change for games may be hiding a bruise. Another sign may be that a child does not want to go home. That is particularly true of the child who wants to run away. It is essential that teachers should know what to do about such worrying signs. Health visitors, who have a practical knowledge of child development, also have a key role to play.

One member of the team who receives wide praise is the police officer. The police have become specialists and extremely sophisticated in dealing with cases of child abuse, particularly sexual abuse. They have the reputation for straightforward but sensitive communication with parents as well as for taking statements prior to any legal proceedings. They make a significant contribution to the team.

Inevitably, tension can arise from the conflict between the need for confidentiality and the need to communicate about children at risk. Guidance on how to weigh up the conflicts between the different professional groups involved would be helpful.

Magistrates are as vulnerable as social workers to the pressures of public opinion and to the danger of making decisions which eventually result in disaster. I hope that this debate on child abuse will be used as an opportunity to discuss once again the future of our juvenile court arrangements: whether it makes sense to have adversarial conflict between the child and a local authority, in which parents have no official standing, or whether we should establish family courts and an inquisitorial system which would allow the court to become a seeker after the truth and to call expert witnesses, instead of being told that certain evidence is not admissible. Court delays can be particularly damaging to a child. A child of three months about whom a decision takes three or six months to be made spends two thirds of its life as the victim of indecision.

The public have a role to play. After a disaster has occurred we are too often told that somebody knew something, or thought something, or had heard something. The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has played an excellent role in maintaining public confidence, but particularly at a time when families are geographically separated it is very important that good neighbours should be prepared to take action and to inform the relevant authorities of their concern.

I appreciate the steps which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security is taking to review the procedures and to provide further guidelines in cases of child abuse. It is essential that public confidence should be maintained. For this reason I urge him to think again about the collection of national statistics. None of us can fail to have powerful professional, political and above all personal reactions when things go wrong. I urge him not only to consider the natural outrage that is felt when disasters occur and to make every effort to learn from the mistakes, but to reach his conclusions with a full appreciation of the complexity of the task with which professional social workers and others have been entrusted and with an awareness of the good practice and of the progress that is being made in many areas.

10.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): Before the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) leaves the Chamber, may I say how very pleased my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) and I are that he has listened to our short debate. The Government join the Opposition in warmly congratulating the right hon. Gentleman upon his 40th anniversary as a Member of Parliament. We value having him as the Father of our House. We hope that he will long continue to play that role.

Today the right hon. Gentleman looks very much as he did in that splendid general election photograph of 1945, which is copied this morning in The Times. The importance of his election to his then Cardiff constituency and the importance of that watershed general election victory by the Labour party in 1945 passed me by entirely. I did not notice it. My only excuse is that I was then only eight days old. My mind was, alas, on other things. The House warmly congratulates the right hon. Gentleman on his anniversary.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I am very grateful to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. May I intervene to congratulate the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on her very interesting and wide-ranging speech, to which I listened with great attention. In the past I had some small responsibility for these matters. The hon. Lady referred to the consequences of the Seebohm commission. We have been unable to reconcile the care of the child with the control of the child. When they are in two separate hands, it is bound to be a recipe for division. The care of the child and the control of the child should surely be in the same hands, or there should at least be the same over-arching responsibility for them.

The Children and Young Persons Act 1969 has not worked out as it should have done, because the children's department in the Home Office, which was able to reconcile those two responsibilities, has disappeared. I am not suggesting that there should be an overhaul of the administration, but I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will consider carefully the hon. Lady's point about the need for reconciliation of the tension between magistrates and social workers. That cannot be good for the future welfare of these children. I hope that he will forgive me for saying that. I fear that I shall have to leave the Chamber very soon, but I shall read his speech.

Mr. Patten: Characteristically, the right hon. Gentleman has pre-empted a large part of my speech. I shall turn from time to time during it to exactly those tensions. When the right hon. Gentleman has a chance to read my speech, he will see that his wise words are reflected in what I am about to say. I join him in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West for the characteristically measured, balanced and articulate way in which she dealt with this most difficult problem. The House listens to her with respect because she has experience of these problems in both the social work and voluntary sectors. She is also a distinguished justice of the peace.

It is curious that my hon. Friend's Adjournment debate should be on the day after the trial of those involved in the tragic case of Tyra Henry. That case, and cases like it, cannot fail to stir the emotions of everyone who reads about them. I appreciate that, and I share the abhorrence which has been well reflected in what has been said about the cases that have occurred this year. However, those emotions must never be allowed to cloud the real problems that exist for social workers, the courts, doctors and others who have the difficult task of trying to balance the rights and welfare of the child with the need to return a child to his or her family, while ensuring that the protection of the child is paramount. The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth mentioned those tensions.

Recent tragic cases have brought home to us all the sad extremes to which parents may go in abusing their children. But they are extremes, and there is a danger that they may give a false impression that all is failure. Such statistics as we have from the NSPCC and other bodies seem to demonstrate that, although child abuse cases must always be matters for considerable concern, there has been a welcome levelling-off, if not a slight decline, in the incidence of child abuse in recent years. My hon. Friend made an important point about whether our national statistics are adequate for our purposes. I wish to deal with that point in more detail than I can fit into the short time that remains, so I shall write to my hon. Friend and set out my views.

One problem is the under-reporting of child abuse, whether it be physical or mental. It is interesting that we have had many more reports of child sexual abuse during the past two or three years than we have ever had. Does that represent an increase in that disgusting practice, or does it represent an increase in the reporting of such cases because people are now prepared to talk about it? I believe that the latter is true, and that the incidence of reporting has been the most important trend in recent years.

The Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley) indicated assent.

Mr. Patten: I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment — the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) — who has considerable experience in social work issues, agrees with that.

Professional staff in all disciplines and in all authorities who are in contact with children and families work extremely hard, with much unpublicised success, to help families who have problems. However, I should make it clear that a minority of social workers, social work managers and their political masters—the councillors in borough, district and county authorities — have rightly been criticised for their failings. But they are a tiny minority. The vast majority of social workers perform their difficult tasks extremely well. Most of us in the Chamber this morning would find it acutely difficult to perform those tasks.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that, sadly, some teachers, policemen, magistrates, health visitors and members of the public have not acted as responsibly as they might have done in some cases?

Mr. Patten: That has sometimes been the case, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that only a small minority are involved. An unfortunate side effect of cases such as the ones about which we have read this year is that the entire profession gets a bad name for the failings of the few. That is not to say that the few should not be strongly criticised, or that the failure of management properly to direct social workers in their tasks should not be exposed. We should also expose the failings of a small minority of councillors, especially in one or two London boroughs, who have interfered dramatically with the professional judgments of social workers and made their jobs almost impossible.

These are not anecdotal remarks from a Conservative Minister. One need only read a report in last week's edition of the journal Community Care from social workers in the London borough of Lambeth, who resent the political interference that makes their jobs much more difficult. Councillors, having laid down policy guidelines, should not give in to the temptation of interfering with professional judgments. That is not their role.

All our efforts in the community stress that we must have an integrated approach to dealing with child abuse. A variety of forms of help can be made available to rehabilitate families. Authorities and voluntary organisations have developed a wide range of facilities, such as day and family centres, which provide much advice and help. In parallel to this activity, we must encourage the entire community to understand its role in helping families in trouble. That echoes a remark made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West. For example, there has been an encouraging growth in self-help groups in the community which offer assistance to families under stress — perhaps with telephone help lines. We should encourage the continuing growth of help in the community and care by the community for children at risk.

However, we must not be complacent. My hon. Friend referred, kindly, to some of the initiatives taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself. We cannot stop there. We have a considerable task ahead of us in ensuring that tragic cases are avoided in the future. No one in the House would suggest that changes in the law, the guidance that we send out, the statements that I make from the Dispatch Box attempting to influence social workers, social work practice, social work management and those who direct social workers will stamp out the problem. We know that that will never happen, but we must redouble the efforts that we have made during the past few months to ensure that such cases become less likely.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Although I agree entirely that voluntary organisations and communities can help, we must ask how much a voluntary organisation can do in a case of child abuse before a professional judgment is needed. Neighbours looking after a family which they know is under stress may not always see the signs of abuse. Reliance on voluntary services must be limited because, in most cases, professional judgments are needed.

Recently, I heard about a Dr. Barnardo's pilot scheme for providing day fostering to parents under stress. The scheme looks after the child, and teaches the mother how to look after her children properly. Although it is a voluntary organisation, I believe that the professionals must judge how much that stress could be eased by removing the child from the home for a few hours a day. I am worried that if there is a reliance on voluntary organisations the necessary professional judgments will not be made.

Mr. Patten: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for intervening because he has raised some important points. I know of his interest in these matters. I agree that we must use voluntary organisations carefully. Professional judgments must not be suborned or second-guessed by voluntary organisations, individuals or politicians. However, professional social workers are employed by organisations such as Dr. Barnardo's and the NSPCC. We need partnership, and I believe that social work departments should take the lead in organising voluntary groups and bringing them together so that the problems to which the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred can be resolved.

In the nine minutes that are left, I hope that I shall have time to pinpoint the six main points of our overall strategy. The first is that we must continue to learn lessons from serious cases that arise. Based on experience that we have gained from such investigations, on 4 July we issued a consultative paper which sets out to speed up the process of investigation. I am extremely pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West gave it such a warm welcome. We had close consultation with the social work profession, which also has warmly welcomed the paper.

I remember doing an interview on a BBC radio programme a couple of weeks ago, when I made that announcement. At the end of the interview the rather surprised announcer said that the BBC had telephoned the British Association of Social Workers, which said that it agreed with everything that I had said. I was delighted about that warm welcome. I am not criticising the BASW, but simply saying that it was a great disappointment to the BBC commentator.

Secondly, we must make sure that the law is working well. We responded quickly to the excellent report by the Select Committee on Social Services. Child care law is the essential legal foundation on which much of our work to provide help for abusing families is built. We intend, through our current review of child care law to produce a much clearer and much more consistent legal framework in which child care practitioners can operate. That is critical, because there is an enormous area of overlap between the work of my Department and that of the Lord Chancellor's Department. Over the past few months we have had a very helpful set of informal consultations with a wide range of groups of those involved about possible changes and potential benefits that may accrue from changes in child care laws.

There has been a suggestion that that is taking rather a long time. All that I would say to those who say that we are taking a long time is that it is an incredibly complicated area. We have a substantial number of consultation papers, which stand a foot or so high. It is a very complex law. Strong feelings and human emotions are closely involved. However, we shall issue a consultation paper in the autumn—by which I mean the autumn—so that those interested can look at our ideas for reform. Those ideas will of course be related to the general examination being conducted by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hailsham, into the concept of family courts. That idea does not fall within the remit and responsibilities of my Department, but should such things come about in child care law that would be critically important.

Thirdly, we must make absolutely sure that our guidance is good. We must have a sound legal foundation on which we can continue to develop the procedural framework for dealing with child abuse. We are trying to develop the two things together. I am not waiting for the final reviews of the legal framework for child law before developing a better and tighter procedural framework for dealing with child abuse. The message from so many child abuse inquiries—alas, there have been many in the past — has pointed to the critical importance of good collaboration among authorities. My hon. Friend also referred to that matter.

Over the past 15 years successive Governments have issued a wide range of advice in that area, and we believe that the time is now appropriate for a much more comprehensive review of that material — to bring the whole lot up to date, to try to make it as sensible, but as direct, as possible, and to try to introduce advice for the first time ever about the extremely difficult and sensitive area of child sex abuse. I hope to be able to provide a collaborative framework within which professional and voluntary sector child care practice can develop. We are also looking at prevention and training, to which my hon. Friend referred. We hope to issue a further consultative paper by the end of the year.

If anyone is impatient with the idea of producing consultative papers, let me tell him that again it is a complicated area. We must consult the professions involved and carry them with us, because it is the social workers on the ground who have to do those exceptionally difficult tasks. However, I am determined that the guidance that will flow from the consultation by the end of the year will be definitive; of the sort that we have not seen before in social work practice.

Fourthly, we must monitor what the statutory social service departments actually do. It is sometimes forgotten by the general public and the media that local authorities run social work departments. They have the legal responsibility for looking after children in care. It is we who have to lay down the guidance, and the development of the professional skills of social workers is an essential part of our bid to improve services. As a contribution to that development, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set up on 1 April this year a Social Services Inspectorate. I welcome what my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West said about the work of the inspectorate so far. It was set up with the agreement of the statutory authorities. I welcome the tribute that she paid to the work already done by the chief inspector, Mr. Utting, who sent out a letter giving additional guidance on child abuse.

One of the first tasks that I have set the Social Services Inspectorate is to have a radical, rapid look at practice on the ground in connection with child abuse and report back as a matter of urgency so that we can build those conclusions into guidance which we shall introduce in order, we hope, to minimise the risk of tragic cases such as have been described today.

Fifthly, we are introducing regular structured reviews of the circumstances of children in care, trying to balance the needs of children's families and the worries and concerns of social work departments against the needs, interests and welfare of the children. In the light of the work that we are doing on child care law, we are looking again at the guidance that we are giving on that.

Finally, we hope to promote throughout the social work profession and the social work world, nationally and locally—it is at local level that so much is done—the idea that common sense is critical in what social workers do, and that in the continuing debate on whether one should be more or less cautious about a child's welfare, whether to return it to a family should there be any element of risk, in the last resort it must be the welfare and safety of the child that come first.

Recognising that the individual social worker has a difficult role, we believe that he or she must in the end follow the basic procedures laid down — the basic guidance that I gave in April this year. That is that if a child is at risk, and if a social worker has been told to visit and see that child, the social worker must do so. There is no excuse whatever for any social worker, whatever the difficulties he is working under, not to visit a child who is deemed to be at risk. Equally, there is absolutely no excuse for any social work managers not to have definitive instructions and structures within which social workers work. They should give guidance and make sure that it is carried through.

I think that social workers in some parts of the country would be greatly helped in carrying out their task if they were not interfered with by the politicians, who sometimes control and adversely affect what they do, as we have seen recently in Lambeth and one or two other London boroughs.

The Government are determined to introduce by Christmas a new set of guidelines for the entire social work profession that will be based on the six main points that I have mentioned. We hope that this will minimise further tragic cases of the sort that have so appalled the nation.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

Okehampton Bypass

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the bypass of Okehampton on the A30.

The House will know that earlier this year the Government's compulsory purchase orders for a route for the bypass to the south of the town were referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament under the Statutory Orders (Special Procedure) Act 1945. That Committee, by a majority of four to two, recommended rejecting the orders, and proposed instead a route to the north of the town. This recommendation was contrary to that of the independent inspector, who held a 96-day public inquiry during which all the issues were exhaustively discussed. He endorsed the southern route which has been the route preferred by all successive Administrations since 1976. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I agreed with the inspector, that the balance of environmental and economic advantage lies in favour of the southern route, and we proceeded to make the orders.

One thing is clear — everyone is united about the need for a bypass, although I am fully aware of the strong and conflicting opinions which the route of the proposed bypass has aroused, both in Parliament and in the south-west of England. This issue must be resolved once and for all.

The Joint Committee believes that a route to the north could be constructed quickly. I must tell the House that it takes on average 13 years to plan and build a road.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Rubbish.

Mr. Ridley: With the best will in the world and no difficulties arising, I doubt whether we could complete a northern route in much under eight or nine years. It could be much more if there were difficulties, or if the inspector was again to recommend the southern route. For the people of Okehampton and the people of Devon and Cornwall the long delay and the uncertainty would be intolerable when the southern route could be completed in three years.

Parliamentary Select Committees make reports to Parliament, and it is for Parliament to accept or reject them. In this case a procedure for doing this is laid down in the Statutory Orders (Special Procedure) Act. It provides in section 6 for a confirming Bill to be brought in. Accordingly, the Government will introduce such a Bill, at the earliest opportunity, to confirm the southern route.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is it not an outrage—[HON. MEMBERS: "No".]—that the Secretary of State should announce such an insensitive and arrogant decision? How can he possibly pretend that he can justify the destruction of an area of supreme natural beauty——

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Rubbish.

Mrs. Dunwoody: —which is a national asset, on the basis of needing to push ahead with a bypass because it will take 13 years to find an alternative route?

If work were started immediately — the right hon. Gentleman knows very well that the southern route cannot be started immediately because a Bill will have to pass through the Houses of Parliament—it would still take until 1988 to finish the requisite road. Will the right hon. Gentleman admit that if the northern route were started as quickly it would take only two more years to complete a route which would do no damage and which would be environmentally acceptable?

As the northern route has already been surveyed, all the preparatory work has been done and the environmental groups concerned have said that they would be anxious to speed the agreement of the planning procedures for the northern route, how can the Minister justify ignoring all the evidence and the views of the Joint Committee? He is saying, in effect, that the interests of the nation as a whole are of no concern to him and that only financial matters concern him. He should resign and do something constructive to protect transport in Britain.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady has some explaining to do. On 3 September 1976, the then Labour Government issued a press notice which read:

"The preferred route passes to the south of Okehampton."

If that was the view of her party then, she has to tell us why she has changed her mind. She will have an opportunity to do that when the confirming Bill comes forward. Secondly, my Department advises me that, if we were to go for a route to the north of the town, the inspector's report on the line order could be expected to be with the Department by 1989. The inspector's report on the compulsory purchases order might be with us by the end of 1991, assuming that there were no difficulties. It would then take three years to construct the road. The earliest completion date would be about 1994.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Ridley: If the inspector were to consider the route to the north at a public inquiry and report that the route should go to the south, as his predecessor did, it is highly likely that we should spend eight or nine years only to find ourselves in the same position without any route for Okehampton.

The hypocrisy of the Labour party sickens me. The bypass means jobs. There will not be jobs in Devon and Cornwall unless I get the bypass built. If the hon. Lady cares about the unemployed, she will be true to what she knows is the right decision.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a Back-Bench day. I ask hon. Members to put their questions briefly.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, if the Department of Transport had obeyed its own policy guidelines as laid out in paragraph 58 of the 1976 circular—

"no new route. . . should be constructed through a national park . . . unless", in effect, there is no "reasonable alternative" — the bypass could have been built along the northern route long ago? Further, will he take aboard the fact that by so arrogantly overruling his own policies and reversing a decision that had been carefully considered by a Joint Committee he is creating a constitutional precedent that will undoubtedly arouse a great deal of criticism in this place, in another place and outside? Have we not had enough banana skins in recent months, and have not inspectors and Departments come to wrong decisions before?

Mr. Ridley: I understand that my hon. Friend took the opposite view to mine in the Joint Committee. I must complete his quotation from the national park circular. It continues:

"Application of the policy to some parks does, however, give rise to particularly difficult considerations because of their geographical location."

This is an example of just that. The Statutory Orders (Special Procedures) Act 1945 lays down the procedure for the report of a Joint Committee to be considered by Parliament. Therefore, it is not unconstitutional to follow the carefully laid down provisions in the Act. Furthermore, my hon. Friend may not be aware that, on 4 May 1949, the then Labour Government introduced a confirming Bill to alter the report of a Joint Committee on the Mid-Northamptonshire Water Board Order. There is nothing unique or unconstitutional about what the Government are doing.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Is it not a fact that the national parks are vested in this House and it is for the House to decide whether to accept the Minister's judgment, which many of us believe to be wrongly based in terms of its historical perspective and in terms of the estimate which he has given to achieve the northern route? Exaggerating his claim will not help his case when it comes to the House. Will he confirm that no Whip will be placed on Conservative Members and that the issue will be judged on its merits? Will he confirm also that there will be no attempt to impose a governmental view on what should be an environmental choice for all right hon. and hon. Members?

Mr. Ridley: I confirm that it is for Parliament to take a decision upon reports prepared by the Committees of Parliament. This issue can be resolved only by Parliament. Committees do not make decisions; they make recommendations to Parliament which, in the end, has to decide one way or another. We are giving Parliament an opportunity to do that. As to what guidance is given to my right hon. and hon. Friends, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary. I shall be interested to hear what guidance the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) gives to his hon. Friends.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): As the hon. Member whose constituency is affected, I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Cabinet on their decision. I am sure that he will know that the people of Okehampton and Cornwall are delighted as well. This is a courageous decision and the right one in the circumstances. I ask him to urge the Government forward, enabling the Bill to have a speedy passage through Parliament, so that the sufferings of the people of Okehampton and Cornwall will be ended finally. The Leader of the Opposition came to the west country recently and said that there would be hundreds of thousands of new jobs under a Labour Government. It is extraordinary that the very action that would help unemployment and the economic situation in the south-west is now being frustrated by the Opposition and the alliance.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I am sure that he is right that we must consider the interests of his constituents and the people of Devon and Cornwall. It might interest the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to know that, when her Government consulted the people of Okehampton and its surrounding area in 1976 in a comprehensive questionnaire to which 1,030 people filled in the answers, 55 per cent. expressed themselves unquestionably in favour of the southern route. The people concerned, whom my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) represents so ably, are clearly in favour of the Government's decision.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Does the Minister appreciate that, while we recognise the importance of jobs and the need for a bypass at Okehampton, his statement will be seen as shameful? He has come to the House on the last day of this term to make it and, for the sake of two years, he is prepared to desecrate one of our national parks. This is final proof of the Government's complete disregard of things environmental.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must check. I was willing to make the statement yesterday, but it was agreed between the usual channels, including his own usual channels, that I should make the statement today instead. I was determined to make a statement to the House rather than answer a written question, and it is hard to be hauled over the coals when I have taken the trouble to come here when the House is sitting.

The hon. Gentleman is constructing an argument on a false premise. He said that adopting the northern route will take two years longer, and his case and that of the right hon. Member for Devonport rests on that proposition. However, that is not true. The northern route would take eight years at least, and perhaps still longer. I have no intention of short-circuiting the proper procedures for consulting and for public inquiries, and I am sure that he would not wish me to do so. Are the Opposition suggesting that we would cheat the people of Okehampton of the opportunity of consultation on a northern route? There is no northern route, and we should have to start from scratch. I advise the hon. Gentleman to get a better argument before he comes to discuss the merits of this when we debate the confirming Bill.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the events in the Joint Committee, while within the letter of the original law, were not within the spirit of it, and that a small alteration to the proceedings of the House would stop a rehearing of a public inquiry, which is what took place on this occasion? I hope that my right hon. Friend will use whatever muscle he has to help that change take place.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. The orders were referred to the Joint Committee because it was proposed to take open space, not national parkland. The 1945 Act is relevant only where open space land is taken. It was held by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment that inadequate open space land could be offered in return for the land that was to be taken. The Joint Committee was asked to look not at national parks or the route of the bypass, but at the quality and quantity of the replacement land. Therefore, it greatly widened its remit —I am not criticising it—by going into the issue of where the bypass should be, as that had been determined by a public inquiry endorsed by my right hon. Friend and myself.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Given that the Secretary of State knows that there is general agreement that something must be decided soon for the people of Okehampton and Cornwall, will he nevertheless accept that people are opposed to his attitude because he knows that the Government will change the procedures for planning inquiries in major legislation to be introduced in the coming Session? He knows that he is creating a precedent of breaking into national parks, which many people regard as extremely distasteful.

Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the question put to him by my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)? In the knowledge that this is not a party political issue, will he confirm that there will not be a party-political, determined, steam-rollered vote on a matter of vital importance for jobs and the environment? This is a matter not of Government policy but of local government policy, and hon. Members should be left to decide freely on it. The Government should not be dictating what some of their Members should do on a decision with which they fundamentally disagree.

Mr. Ridley: I quite see why the hon. Gentleman does not want to whip the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon)—he has apologised to me for not being here—who is keen that the road should be built. I repeat that questions on what is done by my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary are not for me to respond to.

I take the hon. Gentleman to task on his suggestion that there is something improper about the proceedings, which are strictly in accordance with the 1945 Act. The decision was referred to Parliament when it was decided to put the matter before the Joint Committee. The procedure is laid out in the Act and all the Government are doing is scrupulously following procedure. As the high court of Parliament has now made this decision, nobody can complain. The democratic nature of what I am suggesting is patently clear and obvious. The House can decide by vote and that is the right way to settle the matter.

Mr. Harris: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision will be received with massive relief in Cornwall, not least in my constituency, which is the most westerly and remote in the south-west peninsula, because poor communications are the biggest problem that Cornwall faces in trying to attract jobs? Should not the so-called environmentalists, and those who misguidedly support them in the House on this issue, stop and think what enormous damage they are doing not just to Okehampton, which again this weekend will suffer its usual horrendous traffic jams, but to the whole economy of Cornwall, to every industry, to farming, to fishing and, not least, to the tourist trade?

Mr. Ridley: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend that this is a matter of vital importance to the local people of Okehampton, Devon and Cornwall. For the House to ride roughshod over their economic interests is tempting our tolerance too far. I hope that hon. Members who are not certain about this matter will take the opportunity of the recess to go down to Okehampton and discuss it with the people living in the south-west. I am sure that my hon. Friend can arrange for them to meet the people who are vitally affected by these decisions.

If we are at all serious in our desire to find more employment in any part of the kingdom, we must not stand in the way of doing away with impediments to the growth of business and the improvement of the tourist trade. The general economic position of the south-west is grievously threatened by the absence of this road. If jobs mean anything, they have to be provided by uncorking this bottleneck.

Many people, including the inspector who held the public inquiry, believe that the southern route for the road would do less damage to the environment than a northern route would. It is not as if there is a solid opinion on the environmental aspect. There are two views on that, too. I am certain that the balance of advantage lies in the route that the Government propose, and I hope that hon. Members will take heed of what local people want.

Mr. Steen: I think that the House knows that I have a sneaking admiration for my right hon. Friend and for the way in which he has handled the bus and aviation Bills. However, does he realise that he is wasting time by pushing for a route through the national park because his officials have said that that route can be built by 1988 whereas the northern route cannot be built by 1990? Will my right hon. Friend check during the recess with officials who are against the northern route to see whether they are right in saying that that route will take eight or nine years longer? Officials have made that claim, but experts who have been involved on work on other motorways and dual carriageways have said that there would be only a two-year difference between the two routes.

Will my right hon. Friend also please realise that if the southern route were built through the national park, a bottleneck would occur at the other end of the dual carriageway because there is only a single carriageway from Okehampton to Launceston? All that we shall do is to move the bottleneck to the other side of Okehampton.

Does the Secretary of State realise the damage that he will do to the Conservative party by uniting the environmental and conservation lobbies throughout Britain who will be determined that the southern route should not proceed? Does he really want to drive a coach and horses through his own side?

Mr. Ridley: We hope to complete the Launceston part of the road in roughly the same time scale as the southern bypass could be completed. If we went for a northern route for the bypass, there would be a long period when the only bit that was not proper double-track bypass would be the centre of Okehampton where the present road goes. That would produce chaos in the town as well as for those who are trying to pass through to Devon and Cornwall.

I have checked endlessly with all concerned and the times that I gave for the completion of the line order and the CPOs by 1991 is the fastest that my officials think that it could possibly go if all goes well. I must take my hon. Friend through this likelihood. An inspector of great repute, having considered the matter at great length and heard all the evidence over 96 days, has come down in favour of the southern route for environmental as well as economic reasons. Therefore, if another equally impartial and wise inspector were to consider the evidence again at a public inquiry into a northern route, it seems prima facie likely that he would come to the same conclusion as the first inspector. If that happened, we should have gone through six years or so and still no decision would have been taken and no possibility of taking a decision would exist. The matter has been put to the high court of Parliament and must be resolved by Parliament.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): I thank and congratulate my right hon. Friend, whose decision will bring relief and reassurance to many local government organisations and other groups in the west country and particlarly in Cornwall. I have no doubt that in my constituency, as in other parts of the county, there will be horror among those who thought that they might support the alliance, and the prospective Liberal candidate for my constituency will be thunderstruck when he hears what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) have said.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the extension of the dual carriageway from Whiddon Down to Okehampton takes several miles out of the national park as well as putting some back in? Will he also confirm that, if he had not proposed to introduce the Bill and had tried to accelerate the procedures on a northern route, there would have been an outcry, because all the people to the north would expect all their rights to be honoured and to have full consultation and a public inquiry? The time scale that my right hon. Friend puts on a northern route is too short rather than too long.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the RAC should be congratulated on sending a leaflet to all its members? I have an RAC leaftlet sent to people planning to drive to Cornwall which says:

"Driving to Cornwall? The A30 bottleneck at Okehampton can mean long summer delays."

Cornwall cannot tolerate that continuing hassle and the continuing burden on its tourist and other industries. I congratulate my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I look forward to hearing whether the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) will be whipping the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)——

Mr. Simon Hughes: He will not.

Mr. Ridley: —or whether it will be the other way round. We are told that it is an alliance, so presumably it will behave as an alliance. It will be interesting to see which way it breaks.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) rightly says, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is trying to pontificate on what is in the interests of the people of Devon and Cornwall. It is worth finding out first what people think.

I agree with my hon. Friend that if we sought to accelarate the procedures in investigating a northern route we should attract the full ire of the environmental lobby and of the people who have interests on that route. That would be intolerable. Just because the environmental lobby has decided that it wants to sacrifice the nothern route, that does not mean that people who have interests on that route should not have their rights properly considered.

I have not seen the RAC leaflet that my hon. Friend mentioned, but I hope and pray that it will not be for too many more years that people have to queue for hours before proceeding to their holidays in Devon and Cornwall.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the time taken by the statement on the Okehampton bypass, I suggest that the debate initiated by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) should continue until noon and that the debate of the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) should conclude at 12.30 pm.

11.27 am

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Today is the last day of term for hon. Members and it ought to be the last day in public office of the governor of the Bank of England. His responsibility and culpability are awesome. He has presided over a fantasy so bizarre that it is believable only because it is true. He has supervised a bank that has financed fraud and provided money for the purposes of criminals.

It is no wonder that a number of peope to whom I have spoken in the City of London believe that the appropriate course for the governor of the Bank of England would be for him to tender his resignation. Certainly the sort of people whom I represent can only view with incredulity the behaviour in this dreadful affair of those who claim to be their betters.

My investigations have tended to show that Johnson Matthey lent money to people who were known to have been dishonest, or would have been shown to be dishonest if Johnson Matthey had carried out even the most elementary inquiries. It seems to me that all the members of the credit rating committee of Johnson Matthey Bankers are liable to be sued for breach of their fiduciary duty at common law, which duty is to act in the best interests of their company. I ask the governor of the Bank of England why the members of the credit rating committee have not been sued for a breach of their fiduciary duty and why they have not received writs of negligence.

When I said some days ago that Mr. Mahmoud Sipra, whose El Saeed empire was the basis of the collapse of JMB, had committed fraud and that JMB ought to have known about it and ought not the have lent his empire vast sums of money, Mr. Sipra appeared on BBC television and Channel 4 news and said that he was a man of great integrity. If Mr. Sipra believes that, he is living in a fantasy world of his own and his memory must be extraordinarily defective.

Only last year, on 9 October 1984, a judgment for fraud was given against him in the New York district court by Judge Kevin Duffy. I have a transcript of that judgment with me, so of course I can repeat it outside should the Whips ask me to do so. The judge said:

"The callous indifference to the law exhibited by Dr. Galin and Sipra from the inception of these actions in 1979 to the day of trial is only one example of their bad faith."

He also said:

"Dr. Galin used Rascator and Sipra used Intra-Span in order to further their fraudulent plan."

He began his summing-up by saying that "old-fashioned piracy" and "extraordinary greed" were at the heart of the case.

The governor of the Bank of England must explain to this House how a British bank supervised by the governor of the Bank of England could be lending money to a man who, throughout the period of the lending, was, according to the judiciary, acting with callous indifference to the law in relation to fraud. That question lies at the heart of the Johnson Matthey collapse.

When Mr. Ian Fraser, a director of Johnson Matthey, was put on warning about Sipra in 1982, he said that Mr. Sipra would perform — that the man known to his friends as the Cobra and to his enemies as the Devil would meet his contracts and repay his loans. How on earth could Mr. Fraser have said, and believed, that?

We know now, in relation to Mr. Sipra's empire, that since the collapse of Johnson Matthey these companies have been wound up or have had a receiver put in by the governor of the Bank of England: Nitemed, Monostick, Eurostem Maritime, Bulk Ferks, Trans-Gulf Lines, the Khyber Horce Company and Brooke Oil. They have all failed to perform, and Johnson Matthey must have known that they would fail to perform. Many millions of pounds have been lost to Johnson Matthey as a result. I could go on speaking about frauds by Mr. Sipra, but that might take us outside the subject.

What can one say about the behaviour of Mr. Ian Fraser, a director of Johnson Matthey? He, clearly, is in breach of his fiduciary duty at common law — I understand that he is a rich man—and should be sued for negligence because of that breach. But can we leave it there? We are talking about the loss of vast sums of money, and it seems that there are only three explanations for Mr. Fraser's behaviour. The first is that he might be a simpleton, the second is that he has turned a blind eye to fraud and the third is that he is a party to fraud. I believe that we can reject the first—that he is a simpleton—so that we are left with two alternatives. Either he has turned a blind eye to fraud or he is a party to fraud.

Mr. Fraser should be subjected to the most vigorous examination, and we may have to conduct a special investigation in this case and certain witnesses may have to be given immunity. My private inquiries into what is going on reveal that the fraud squad accepts that there was massive fraud and that the directors of Johnson Matthey were involved. However, there are enormous evidential problems and it is beginning to look as though no one will be brought to court because of those evidential problems.

The governor of the Bank of England may bear some responsibility for that — for giving these people nine months in which to lose documents, to sort out affairs with their accountants and get their alibis fixed up. It is an appalling state of affairs and the governor of the Bank of England is the man who primarily should answer for that.

I come to the case of a loan made to Ravensbury Investments to purchase Provincial Properties Wales, to enable that company to develop a piece of land in Barry and carry out a property development. Mr. Michael Hepker, who is the beneficial owner of Ravensbury Investments and Provincial Properties, has publicly said that I am being unfair to him, that he, too, is a man of great integrity and that he is a respectable business man.

What kind of respectable business man, when he is reported to the takeover panel and evidence is given against him to that panel—as it was on 12 July 1985—has friends who will telephone the person giving evidence and say that his legs will be blown off if he does not behave himself? What kind of respectable business man makes a fool of 12 police officers and sends them on a bogus raid to discover illegal firearms? That was last Friday.

What kind of respectable business man tries to ruin a man's life by reporting him to the licensing authorities when he has previously worked for Mr. Hepker? What kind of respectabley business man makes allegations of fraud and then has to withdraw them in writing to the police? What kind of respectable business man so frightens solicitors for the companies to which I referred that they must put the documents in a safe because, on Mr. Hepker's record, they fear that they will be raided?

It has been put to me that some attempts might be made to shut me up or encourage me not to talk in the House. People such as the Whips say, "Say it outside." The Islington police have been warned in relation to one of the men. Yesterday I took the trouble to warn Commander Hunter at the Hackney office about any possible consequences for my ex-wife, my son and myself.

Mr. Hepker's background, which Johnson Matthey apparently never investigated, is that he is a tax expert and drew up schemes originally on tax avoidance and then went massively into tax evasion. He set up a company called Marchmont Associates Ltd, which at one time shared offices with Rossminster, a company advised by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. That company is massively involved in tax evasion — in shipping large sums of money out of the country to offshore islands— and the non-payment of tax. Marchmont Associates is also associated with a company called Supersaver.

Only yesterday, Mr. Hepker appeared in the Companies Court. This case will smash offshore tax evasion. Mr. Hepker's time is running out. Indeed, he is under investigation and there are several files inches thick in the possession of the special investigations branch of the Inland Revenue. The special investigator who is hunting him down is Mr. Bryn Jones, who works for the Treasury, so no doubt the Minister can confirm that those investigations are taking place.

Mr. Hepker goes to Johnson Matthey and says, "I want to borrow this money. Provincial Properties will carry out a property development in Barry." What he forgot to tell Johnson Matthey was that the Tesco property development fell through before he borrowed the money. In other words, he borrowed the money by fraudulent misrepresentation and committed an extraordinarily serious crime — in effect, the theft from Johnson Matthey of £1·5 million.

How can I prove that Mr. Hepker knew that the Tesco deal had fallen through? I can prove it because I have counsel's opinion — not counsel for Mr. Hepker's enemies, but counsel for Mr. Hepker. He had to admit to counsel that he knew that the deal had fallen through. Worse than that, he not only knew that it had fallen through, but he went to Johnson Matthey and said that the deal was still on. That was a major fraud.

Matters become even more extraordinary because, once Tesco had withdrawn from the deal, the price of the land plummeted. The price that it had been agreed should be paid for the land was ridiculous, but Mr. Hepker carried on with the deal and bought the land. Why? The only money that has been passed over in this case—£393,310 —was passed over on 8 July 1981. That was over the odds because another £110,000 should have been paid later. It was not.

That still leaves £1 million-plus, which was borrowed. hThat £1 million-plus has never been used for the benefit of Ravensbury Investments Ltd or of Provincial Properties Wales. It has been transferred through a series of companies for Mr. Hepker's personal use. That is a massive fraud. There are two frauds — a fraud on Johnson Matthey and a massive fraud on Ravensbury Investments.

How did Johnson Matthey behave? How did that British bank under the supervision of the governor of the Bank of England behave? It never discovered that the Tesco deal had fallen through. There is no Tesco store on the land in Barry. Johnson Matthey never checked, either then or in the years that followed, on the value of its security. It was told that the land was worth £1 million. When the bank was recently forced by the company to carry out a survey, it appeared that the land was worth £200,000. The bank never monitored the activities of Ravensbury Investments Ltd or of Provincial Properties Wales. Business men all over this country who have borrowed £50,000 from a bank, who have to fill in debenture forms every three months and whose companies are rigorously monitored will gawp at the fact that Johnson Matthey did no monitoring in relation to these loans.

The loan was made by way of overdraft and was on call. At no time in all those years did Johnson Matthey ask for the money back or ask for a repayment schedule. In other words, the bank handed out £1.5 million and then forgot about it. It did nothing. It provided no banking services whatsoever. This is a disgrace. It is not just negligence; it is very suspicious.

It is no wonder that the solicitors to these companies have been saying to Mr. Graham Mark and Mr. Robin Collier, "What does Mr. Hepker have over Johnson Matthey? Why do you not call in these loans?" When Johnson Matthey Bankers collapsed, the chief executive of Ravensbury Investments Ltd and the solicitors to that company wrote to Johnson Matthey saying, "Both these companies are insolvent. They have been insolvent for a long time, and there is no possibility of their ever making money. Why don't you get back your security?"

I have a file containing a bundle of the correspondence going backwards and forwards between the solicitors, the chief executive, Mr. Michael Hepker and Mr. McGregor from Johnson Matthey. Mr. Hepker has said, "Give me a fortnight and I shall stitch up a deal for you." Then he has said, "Give me another fortnight," and "Give me another fortnight." That is what I meant when I told the House that we were being taken for a ride.

At one stage, Mr. Hepker said that he would come up with another property deal. The only problem is that he would have to borrow some money to carry out that deal. What kind of negligent fantasy world is this? This point has been put to me by professional advisers to the company. In the first place, they thought, "Perhaps there are bigger and more serious cases than this £1·5 million loan from Johnson Matthey and that in the end these people at the Bank of England will deal responsibly with it." They have not dealt responsibly with it, because they have done two things. First, by not winding up the company, they have put the other creditors of the company in jeopardy. The other creditors who are owed £300,000 will never get a penny of the money that Mr. Hepker has taken. They have put them in jeopardy by not winding up the company. Secondly, there is roll-over interest on this loan and, in the end, that will increase the amount of money that the Bank of England has to write off. That money is being written off on our behalf. It is a loss not to the Bank of England but to the members of the public. I want to know how the governor of the Bank of England has justified the behaviour of his staff during the last few months.

It goes without saying that I have letters from the companies registration office showing that Mr. Hepker was in breach of section 1(7) of the Companies Act 1976 and sections 124 and 126 of the Companies Act 1948 over the production of documents. That is, however, a minor point.

What happened when the solicitors started to put pressure on Johnson Matthey to get Mr. Hepker to pay the money back? Mr. Hepker took out a curious option agreement and then tried to dismiss the solicitors and chief executive. In the middle of all that, he produced a document that showed a photostat copy of a Bank of England one pound note. I do not know what hon. Members know about criminal law, but it is illegal to photocopy Bank of England one pound notes and to produce bogus option agreements to silence solicitors. I gather that Mr. Hepker will come back to that aspect in time.

Where do we stand in relation to these matters? People have made large sums of money fraudulently and companies have gone bankrupt. There is Mr. Hepker and his company. Johnson Matthey was not performing any banking service. It was not carrying out its duty. There are also the directors of Johnson Matthey who were responsible for the preparation of the accounts. It is not the auditors but the directors who are responsible for the preparation of those accounts. The auditors merely say whether the accounts present a true and fair picture. Under section 393 of the Companies Act 1985 it is a criminal offence if a director "knowingly or recklessly makes to a company's auditors a statement . . . which . . . is misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular."

Anyone who cares to study Johnson Matthey's accounts will know that, whether or not the directors knew that they were making misleading comments, they were certainly reckless, because there is barely a statement in those accounts that has not been made recklessly. Why has not criminal action been taken against those directors who were responsible for the preparation of the accounts?

It is up to the governor of the Bank of England to decide whether he has the integrity to resign. We need an independent wide-ranging inquiry into an extraordinary act that has led to the loss of £248 million and to the public having, in effect, to put up £100 million to bail out a bank. I have taken the House into a fantasy world. It has nothing to do with banking but is about fraud and greed. If we believe that the integrity of public and private life is important, we cannot just let this matter rest. We must ensure that it is investigated ruthlessly so that all the facts are known.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has extended some of the arguments that he put forward some days ago in a brief statement. It is important for us to make it absolutely clear that the British taxpayer is likely to foot the bill not only for all the money that has already been lost and put in by the Bank of England but for other bills. It now transpires, from some of the comments made by my hon. Friend, that the bills will get even larger. As I said some days ago, the chances are that, because of the dilatory fashion in which the Chancellor and the governor of the Bank of England have acted, many of those people to whom hon. Members and the newspapers have referred are likely to get off scot free, as has happened in many other City scandals of the past two decades.

Who will pay these additional bills? Will the Economic Secretary ask the parent company what happened? Will he say, "Why did you allow your errant youngster, Johnson Matthey Bankers, to run wild and deal with all these people? Why is it that you are not taking some responsibility for these massive losses to the taxpayer?"

What about the governor of the Bank of England? Should he not be personally responsible for some of the money that has been lost and the ensuing losses that are likely to occur? My guess is that we shall not be talking about £100 million from the taxpayer; the eventual sum may be double that.

My hon. Friend referred to Mr. Fraser. Should he not bear some responsibility, instead of lumping it all on the taxpayer? I thought that this Government believed in the policy, "You make a profit or you die." I thought that they believed in market forces and entrepreneurs. What was the purpose of all the argument about closing pits, steel works and the rest of the manufacturing base? Was it not all part of the policy, "If you can't make a profit, don't come to the Government for a subsidy. Don't expect us to bail you out. You make a profit or you die"?

There are now more than 3 million unemployed people on the scrap heap. They are witnesses to the Government's policy of making a profit or going under. Yet the crooks in the City can somehow or other launder their way from one fraud to the next, getting away with it, with tax avoidance schemes, and running to Johnson Matthey Bankers and saying, "Give us some more money—at the end of the day the taxpayer will bail us out".

Will Mr. Shamji—the friend of the Prime Minister—pay some of his money back? He should. He has companies up and down the land. I discovered another that he set up not long ago in Strood. Will the Economic Secretary to the Treasury make inquiries about that? If Mr. Shamji can find his way into an enterprise zone at Strood before it is announced in Parliament, somebody must have tipped him off. He already had a derelict factory there months before the area was declared an enterprise zone on 16 November 1982. Mr. Shamji's firm is Gomba UK, and he turned up at the factory in a Rolls-Royce one day early in 1982. Did he get the money from Johnson Matthey? Is that part of the £20 million that he owes? It has been a litany of scandal from one end of the story to the other.

The British people should demand that, instead of the taxpayer being called upon to foot the bill, it should be paid by the people to whom I have referred. The British taxpayer should not be expected to bail out the Chancellor of the Exchequer for all his legal expenses. They should be paid by him or some of the culprits who have been referred to this morning.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): A large number of questions remain unanswered about Johnson Matthey Bankers and the Bank of England's supervision of that bank, and the subsequent problems.

I will take one example of the bank's main debtors—Mr. Abdul Shamji's Gomba group of companies. As the Financial Times reported last Saturday, several companies in the Gomba group face court actions over debt claims and Mr. Jim Sharp, the group's financial controller, is urgently seeking a refinancing package.

Since the master company in the United Kingdom was incorporated in May 1982, companies associated with Mr. Shamji have amassed large borrowings. Accounts up to 1982 of the companies in the group show borrowings of £32·5 million. There may have been other loans from JMB since then, but without up-to-date balance sheets it is impossible to know. Accounts have not been filed in Companies House since 1982. Mr. Shamji also has loans from the Credit and Commerce International Bank, Barclays and the Punjab Bank. His assets are said to be worth about £40 million.

One of the companies, Gomba Stonefield, based at Strood, Kent, in an enterprise zone, was bought from the receiver in 1981. It ran up net losses of £2·7 million in the three years 1982-84, according to Price Waterhouse's special audit. It owed £100,000 PAYE in June, but after a threat by the Inland Revenue to auction 32 containers and their contents, the debt was paid. It is possible that other PAYE debts are outstanding, and also that Gomba did not pay national insurance contributions and PAYE contributions for employees, now redundant, of one of his Scottish companies. Its asset base is strong but earnings of many of the companies in the group are low, suggesting low returns on assets. That could mean that Mr. Shamji now has very real problems. He will need either a refinancing package or a major programme of disposal of assets.

JMB now has problems with Gomba. The Financial Times reported last Saturday, and The Observer on Sunday, that Gomba missed the first payment under the debt rescheduling agreement, and that this still has not been paid.

With regard to loans made to Gomba by JMB, Gomba's accounts filed at Companies House go up only to 1982. What information did JMB have about the accounts of Gomba companies when loans were made? What information was made available to them then?

Is the Bank of England satisfied with the security for the loans? Gomba engages in the not unusual practice of buying property, revaluing it upwards and then borrowing against the new value. Did JMB put its own valuation on Gomba's assets. Has the Bank of England carried out its own valuation since then?

Why should companies such as Gomba Stonefield that default on payments be allowed to continue in existence when so many other companies are forced by the bank into liquidation for similar faults?

Not only Gomba's loans may be doubtful. There is a vague reference in the Bank of England's report describing four anonymous doubtful loans totalling £119 million. There was also very little information about the remaining £129 million. That makes a total of £248 million in doubtful loans, some of them very large. What action is the Bank of England taking to recover those loans? Is £248 million still the correct figure? After all, that figure was given when the Bank of England said that there was no fraud involved. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer last week announced a fraud investigation. What guarantee have we now that £248 million of doubtful loans is the correct figure, and that it will not continue to grow and grow with further recourse to the taxpayer?

I turn to the question of the Bank of England's supervision both then and now. Is it true that the Bank of England had, in effect, restricted its monitoring programme, before the collapse of JMB, to the clearing banks? Is it true that its supervision of the smaller banks was lax?

[Dr. Oonagh McDonald]

In the autumn we expect a White Paper proposing to give the Bank of England new powers, but it will take time for legislation to go through Parliament. May we be sure that the measures that the Government have taken so far —strengthening the banking supervision department at the Bank of England—are sufficient? Will the Minister give his assessment of those new procedures? May we be assured that there is no other JMB in the offing?

As the public have a right to know what happened with JMB, will the Minister arrange for the publication of the Price Waterhouse report? That report should, at the very least, be made available to a suitable committee, and the Minister should reconsider setting up a committee of inquiry under the 1921 Act. No doubt the Minister will recall that two days after the Prime Minister refused an inquiry in a letter to me dated 15 July the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the fraud investigation. The Prime Minister said that she could see no purpose in such an inquiry, but on the very day that the letter was written the governor of the Bank of England said that fraud was suspected. We need a thoroughgoing inquiry. Will the Minister assure us that, once the police investigations are carried out, we shall have that proper full public inquiry?

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I have only a very short time in which to respond to the debate. I cannot, of course, comment on the affairs on individual customers of JMB or of any other bank. I am sure that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) knows that. Equally, I cannot comment on whether or not a particular person is being investigated by the Inland Revenue.

The hon. Member has produced a great deal of information about customers of JMB, much of it in the form of allegations. I should draw the attention of the House to the difference between information and allegation. If the hon. Gentleman has information that he believes to be relevant to the police inquiry, I hope and assume that he will pass it on, because it is important to follow up any available information.

My right hon. Friend's and the Treasury's response is the subject of the debate. My right hon. Friend has reported promptly and fully on matters that are his responsibility. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) welcomes the fact that he reported last week at the first opportunity.

The decision to mount the rescue operation was taken by the governor of the Bank of England on his own authority. He was acting correctly within his discretion and has since published an account of events leading up to the collapse and his reasons for undertaking the rescue. That is a reflection of the traditional relationship which exists between the governor and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is a point which some hon. Members appear to have found difficult to grasp.

I have no further time to respond to the points which have been made, but I repeat that there is a considerable difference between allegation and information and between information and evidence upon which fraud can be pursued.

I hope that, having taken the opportunity of this debate to put forward those matters, the hon. Gentleman will be equally diligent in ensuring that he and any other hon. Member who has information will provide it to the police so that the police inquiry, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) asks, can be as effective as possible and can deal with all the relevant matters.

12.1 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): To say that this summer the package holiday industry has been going through a bad time would be a major understatement. Having enjoyed for some years a slowly rising market, having built up its brochures each year in the expectation that that rising market will continue, and having encouraged the practice of last-minute bookings by offering substantial discounts, the tour operators were faced with not just an estimated 15 per cent. reduction in the expected market, but a substantial shift away from Spain as the preferred holiday destination. What has been regrettable about that pattern and what has occasioned me to raise the subject for debate is the fact that it is the customer who has suffered.

This season has highlighted three practices that exist within the tour operator section of the industry, all of which operate to the detriment of the holidaymaker. The first is the power of the tour operator to make material alterations to a holiday which has been booked and paid for, and to make those alterations up to the last moment before departure without infringing the regulatory code of the industry's governing body — the Association of British Travel Agents Limited. A holidaymaker may discover at the last minute that he or she is going to a different hotel, a different destination, a different resort or, in extreme cases, a different country. The only rights that the customer has are a woolly claim to compensation or the right to cancel the holiday and receive a refund, although with no holiday in prospect.

The second practice is known as consolidation. It enables tour operators to cancel flights, often with virtually no notice, to fill up other flights which have vacant seats. The holidaymaker is thus subjected to many extra hours of travelling and delay and a great deal of what can moderately be described as inconvenience at a time when the holidaymaker is paying for the reverse. Again, there is only a woolly right to compensation if the tour operator chooses to pay it, with the right to cancel and have no holiday.

The most pernicious practice occurs where a tour operator anxious to expand his share of the market puts out brochures containing flights and destinations which he must know he has no hope of fulfilling, thereby hooking the customer who can then be consolidated later onto another flight or another resort. That practice, which is known as ghosting, is known to be widespread and many people have suffered from it.

In all those cases, ABTA is powerless to prevent the abuses to which I have referred. Unless it rapidly sets its house in order, the industry will be defenceless against the major changes proposed in the EEC draft directive that we are discussing.

Since I first showed through the media my interest in this subject, I have had what can only be described as a fairly substantial postbag. To illustrate the need for rapid action, I should like to quote a few of the many cases that have been brought to my attention from all over the country.

Mr. Guthrie of Strathclyde booked a return flight from Malaga to Glasgow. He was informed at Malaga airport one hour before the flight was due to leave that it had been cancelled. He was left at the airport for 12 hours and the following morning was flown to Birmingham, which necessitated a further nine-hour journey to Glasgow.

Mrs. Purchase from Taunton booked last November to fly from Bristol to Austria on 2 June. She paid the final account on 3 April and was then informed that she would have to fly from Luton on 30 May to a different and less attractive destination.

Mr. Whiting of Leicester booked seven days in Corfu with Sunmed holidays and was told the Monday before departure that the resort had been changed. He was offered a substitute resort which was changed the following day. He eventually ended up at inferior apartments which were already occupied.

Mr. Stevens of Wokingham booked to go to Minorca in January. He was forced by consolidation to cancel in April. He booked with Horizon and made the final payment in June. He was again forced to cancel because of consolidation and is now due to travel to Majorca with Thomson Holidays. He has his fingers crossed.

Finally, from my constituency, Mr. Penny and Miss Bartlett, who are getting married on 7 September, booked in March with Thomson Holidays to go to Benidorm from Gatwick during the early afternoon of Sunday 8 September. In June, they were offered a flight change to 7.30 am on the Sunday morning. That would have meant them leaving Bristol at 2 am on their wedding night. They were eventually offered an evening flight on the Sunday to Torremolinos from Bristol at 10.15 pm. for which it was suggested that they should be charged about £100 more.

In the light of those and many other incidents of which I have been informed, many of which were predictable and predicted at the beginning of this year, ABTA should surely by now have announced steps not just to prevent further such problems this summer, but to reorganise its members for the future, yet I understand from Mr. Kenneth Scott, the chief executive officer of Ilkeston Consumer Co-operative Society Limited, who has done considerable research into this problem, that while it is generally accepted that next winter's holiday market might increase by about 10 per cent., Thomson Ski has increased its advertised programme by 33 per cent. and Horizon by 20 per cent.

The problem is not peculiar to this country because, according to a survey by the EEC Commission, out of the 25 million holidaymakers in Europe this summer, approximately 6 million—24 per cent.—will face some disappointment.

If this summer's chaos had been wholly unexpected, and if the need to tighten the package holiday industry's rules to protect the consumer had been sprung on the industry at the last minute, ABTA's inaction in doing no more than enforce its existing code could have been understood. However, the appalling position of bookings for this summer was known in January and many companies faced with the eventual need to consolidate their flights did such consolidations in the early months of the year, and so enabled their customers to have adequate time to rearrange their holidays.

In addition, it was known towards the end of last year that the holiday places available and being offered by ABTA members for this summer exceeded the maximum possible market by anything between 25 and 33 per cent. The proposed EEC directive further to regulate the industry for the benefit of the holidaymaker has been around since at least January this year, but it has never once, to the best of my knowledge, been opened by ABTA for public discussion.

In those circumstances, it is not surprising that the EEC Commission has felt the need to step in and propose a draft directive to improve the regulations of an industry which has, by this summer's experience and this winter's prospective experience, showed itself at least insensitive to the desires of its customers.

The proposals in the draft directive are, in many respects, draconian. As a result, while my hon. Friend the Minister may feel, with considerable justification, that the directive as a whole is inappropriate, I hope that he will still look at some of the provisions contained in it with a view to encouraging the industry to adopt them on a voluntary basis.

For example, article 6(2)(m) of the draft directive calls for the automatic disclosure to the customer of the name and address of the local representative of the tour organiser. Such information would be, and would have been, very welcome to many holidaymakers. It is not a requirement of the present ABTA code.

Article 10(1)(c) provides that the holidaymaker is entitled to cancel and obtain a refund if the holiday is modified significantly—a provision that already exists under the ABTA code—but says that the definition of a significant modification is to be resolved by reference, in part, to the holidaymaker's view of what is significant. So the holidaymaker should have a say in whether or not he is entitled to be protected under the ABTA code—and on that the code is silent.

Article 10(4) provides that, on cancellation of a holiday, the holidaymaker should also be entitled to damages for the loss of his holiday, whereas under the present code he is entitled merely to a refund. Article 5 provides that a deposit on a package holiday should not be more than 10 per cent. of the whole price, again a matter on which the ABTA code is silent.

It cannot be said that there is no precedent in Europe for the package holiday industry to be subject to statutory regulation where all else fails. Draft legislation currently going through the Netherlands Parliament proposes entitlement to damages similar to that contained in the draft EEC directive—something that is already believed to exist in the United States. In addition, the draft Netherlands legislation suggests that all contracts between travel agents and tour operators should be open to public inspection in certain circumstances — a proposal that would flutter a few dovecotes in the travel industry. I understand that the Bill has reached the equivalent of Report stage in the Netherlands Parliament, and is therefore close to the statute book.

Apart from the proposals in the directive or in the proposed new Netherlands law, there are other ways in which the holidaymaker could receive greater protection. I cannot see any reason why, if a customer is obliged to pay the full price for a holiday eight weeks before departure, he should not then be guaranteed that he will get the holiday for which he is paying. Indeed, it would take a great deal of heat out of the issue if ABTA were to announce—and I invite it to do so—that no further consolidations would be put into effect by its members unless they are advertised to their customers within the next seven days.

I appreciate that in that area ABTA has considerable difficulty in self-regulation because it is a body containing, almost in equal measure, two entirely different interests —the travel agents who genuinely want their customers protected and want to retain their customers' goodwill, and the tour operators who want to preserve the maximum freedom of action. Nevertheless, ABTA should be aware that, if it does not set its house in order, more stringent provisions of the sort that I have been discussing will become inevitable.

In view of the publicity that the media have rightly given to the issue already this summer, and in view of the size of my postbag, it is worth putting it on record that this summer many tour operators have adopted an entirely reasonable and responsible attitude to their customers. They have not stuffed their brochures with holidays that they could not possibly sell in sufficient quantities. They have taken adequate care and availed themselves of adequate local knowledge to prevent many overbookings at resorts. Where consolidations or material alterations in holidays have been necessary, they have given their customers ample time to reconsider.

The horrors that I have been describing, the horrors that we have heard of in the media, are not the fault of the whole of the industry, but unfortunately many companies within the industry have not taken the attitude that I have just described. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will impress upon the industry that it is the actions of the latter companies — some of which I have mentioned — that have created the need for EEC legislation to be considered, at least. Similar actions in the Netherlands have created a similar need there. Such actions will continue to feed the need unless the industry puts its house in order and thereby renders an EEC directive unnecessary.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) for bringing the subject of consolidation to the attention of the House. I can well understand the disappointment experienced by travellers who find themselves consolidated at the very last minute. My hon. Friend cited some interesting and sad case histories from his postbag.

My hon. Friend's recommendations are good. I know that the travel industry will be grateful for his constructive approach in the debate, and especially for his remarks complimenting the vast proportion of operators on their responsible approach to the problem. However, if the practices that my hon. Friend described continue, the Government will find it difficult to resist any action proposed by the European Commission. I must point out that no proposals for a directive on package holidays have yet been made to the Council of Ministers by the Commission. However, I believe that the Commission does intend to make a proposal for a directive on package holidays later this year. Until the Government see this proposal, the House will understand that it is difficult for me and the Government to comment on it.

However, the Commission has held meetings of both national experts and the Consumer Consultative Committee to discuss possible draft articles, which might form a draft directive broadly aimed at harmonising that legislation within the Community which affords consumer protection to people taking package holidays. It is to these preliminary draft articles that my hon. Friend referred.

Despite the fact that most member states in the Community do not see the need for such a draft directive, either from a consumer protection view point or as an instrument to stimulate tourism between member states, the Commission still intends, I believe, to submit a revised proposal to the Council of Ministers. Although we have not seen any revised proposal from the Commission, I understand that the current draft would have wide implications for United Kingdom law and practice on package holidays.

European Community legislation has all too frequently been thought by some to be the answer to consumer problems in many areas. I am not convinced that this is the case. The Government firmly believe that the interests of consumers, whether on a package holiday or not, are not served by increasingly rigid legislative controls on the providers of goods and services. Most problems, including any associated with package holidays, are better dealt with at a national level and often the answer lies not in legislation but in effective voluntary, self-regulatory action by the trade involved. Package holidays are a good example of where a voluntary code of practice can and should achieve a high level of consumer protection.

My hon. Friend was accurate, as he invariably is, in reminding the House of the potential conflicts of interest within ABTA. Nevertheless, the ABTA codes of practice, which were drawn up in consultation with the Office of Fair Trading, prescribe rules to be observed by its members, both tour operators and travel agents, in those areas such as descriptions of holidays, booking conditions, alterations, cancellations and price variations, to which my hon. Friend referred in particular. These codes are binding on all ABTA members, who may be fined or expelled for non-compliance. My hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that ABTA members account for the vast majority of package holidays from the United Kingdom.

Provision is also made in the codes of arbitration and conciliation procedures in the event of a dispute between a member and a customer. Although over 7 million package tours were taken last year, ABTA reported that, of the 9,683 complaints dealt with by its conciliation department, only 418 went as far as arbitration. This level of complaints is far lower than that found by the EC Commission in its survey. I might add that many member states disagreed with the findings of the EC survey. The Office of Fair Trading periodically monitors the codes and I understand that the office is currently in the process of doing this.

These codes, coupled with the protection afforded to package holidaymakers by bonding and insurance schemes, mean that the protection offered or available in the travel trade is greater than that in many other sectors.

Consolidations, the practice whereby tour operators, through lack of demand for a particular package tour, may have to transfer travellers to another flight, perhaps from a different airport, have, as my hon. Friend said, been the subject of considerable comment recently. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State responsible for corporate and consumer affairs, when answering a question yesterday on this subject from the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), explained that the Office of Fair Trading will include the question of the consolidations of holiday arrangements in its monitoring of all aspects of ABTA's code of practice. The office has expressed its concern to ABTA about the reported volume of consolidations this year and has asked the association to inform the office of what action it intends to take to deal with this problem. I am confident that we can look to ABTA to continue to enforce its members' adherence to their codes of practice. Already, I am aware that members of ABTA have been fined for breaches of the code.

Some people have argued for legislation to prohibit consolidation, but that is not the answer. The travel trade already has the means to regulate its own behaviour, so that the service it provides is acceptable to its customers. An overall ban on consolidation would no doubt lead to an unacceptable increase in the prices of package tours, so placing them beyond the reach of many people.

Apart from the ABTA codes of practice, the consumer also has the protection of the law. Although in the United Kingdom there are no laws which specifically and exclusively govern rights and duties between consumers and the providers of package holidays in particular, the basic legal position is primarily governed by the ordinary, general law of contract and, in some circumstances, by the law of tort. In both cases the law is based on common law and equitable principles developed over a long period by judicial decisions and modified from time to time by statutory provisions. In both cases, it is open to a party who has suffered loss or damage through breach of contract or other act or omission to seek redress, usually in the form of financial compensation, in the civil courts, although some statutes impose criminal penalties on the wrongdoer.

One of the most important statutory provisions is the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. This Act, in England and Wales, specifies implied terms embodying the respective rights of providers of goods and services and consumers, extending many long-standing provisions relating to the sale of goods to the provision of services. Providers of services, who include tour operators and travel agents, have an obligation to do so with reasonable care and skill, within a reasonable time and for a reasonable charge. Redress for aggrieved consumers is by civil proceedings for damages.

Perhaps I may return to the draft European Commission proposals. When the Commission puts its final proposals for a directive on package holidays to the Council, the document will be available to all member states. When these proposals are received, the Government will of course provide a copy to the House together with an explanatory memorandum. My hon. Friend gave a detailed analysis of the various proposed clauses he has studied, centring in particular on entitlement to damages. It was helpful to hear his comments about the proposed Netherlands law.

The Government will also consult all other interested parties, including representatives of both holidaymakers and the travel trade, about the implications of the proposal. Meanwhile, both the Government and the Office of Fair Trading will continue to look to ABTA effectively to control any practices by its members which are detrimental to the holidaymaker.

Blackmill Hospital, Ogmore

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I am grateful for the allocation of time during the last sitting before the summer recess to place on record the objections of my constituents in Ogmore and other people in the catchment areas of Aberavon, Bridgend, Pontypridd, and the Vale of Glamorgan, all of whom will be directly or indirectly affected by the proposed closure of Blackmill hospital in the Ogmore valley.

It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for my speech. Blackmill hospital is on the side of the Ogmore valley near the small and delightful hamlet of Blackmill. It overlooks a beautiful area and a picturesque valley covered with trees at one end, and the area spreads out into well maintained sheep farms and grazing areas. The valley starts from Nantymoel and stretches through narrow terraced streets through Tynewydd and down to Blackmill. It is one of four similar valleys in my constituency. Access is mostly by secondary roads, which are convenient and of the sort that one would expect to find in the coalmining area of south Wales.

It is well known throughout the world that the Welsh people are friendly, hospitable and responsive and treat their visitors as members of the family, and their qualities of compassion and care are of a high degree. Against that background and description of the area, all those who will read the debate will realise why it is essential to make every effort to save Blackmill hospital for the service that it provides, for the people it serves and in recognition of the wonderful work and dedication of all the staff for the people they nurse.

Blackmill hospital is renowned throughout Mid-Glamorgan and the Principality of Wales and, I suspect, even further afield. Elderly people are nursed by relatives —sons, daughters, grandsons and granddaughters—and in some instances by neighbours. We all know what is entailed in the nursing of elderly people, and those who do it welcome the respite of a week or fortnight or even longer when their elderly charges are allowed to go to Blackmill hospital and the home nurse can have a holiday.

This social facility is essential. There is a real community need. There is an overwhelming demand and that becomes clear as one reads the statistics for Mid-Glamorgan about the increased number of elderly people. The problem is on the increase and, instead of reducing these facilities, we should be increasing them. We should be developing more Blackmill hospitals and not reducing this vital social facility.

I catalogue all the facts so that everyone, including the Minister, will realise the extent of the feeling and concern and the real rebellion among thousands of my constituents over the decision to close this hospital. The way to describe this feeling is to compare it with the rebellion this week of 100 Tory Members against the Government's proposals to increase top salaries. We all know the extent of that rebellion, and I claim that my constituents are equally concerned about this hospital closure, if not more so.

Over the years the Minister and I have on many occasions expressed our opinions and debated general hospital services in Mid-Glamorgan. The Official Report could be referred to repeatedly from 1979 onwards. However, I feel that no mileage can be gained from that. I also have with me the draft consultative document on health services in Mid-Glamorgan published in March 1984. This strategic plan for 1984 to 1993, containing 137 pages, would be ideal ammunition for an all-night sitting of a Committee, but it would not be ideal for today's debate.

However, I must refer to the March 1984 document on the reorganisation of the health services in Ogwr. It was published as a draft consultative document, but, despite many meetings convened by the Ogwr community council all over the borough and the objections to closures from Mid-Glamorgan county, Ogwr borough, 23 community councils and a petition containing 9,937 signatures, the whole planned closure programme will be implemented if the Government are not prepared to relent on their decision to close Blackmill hospital. Surely the significance of this amount of protest will not go unrecognised by the Government.

No doubt the Minister will recall the Adjournment debate on the subject of Bridgend hospital on 22 March 1982—it is now called the Princess of Wales hospital. Hon. Members will find the report of that debate in Hansard of 22 March 1982, at columns 771-78. I ask the Minister to read his reply to that debate and his answer to an oral question on 27 June 1983 on phase 2 of the new hospital.

It is all to do with the closure of many hospitals in Ogwr borough — and the loss of beds, not the increase in accommodation — when waiting lists are getting longer and the elderly are living longer. If I had not secured this debate today I should have been attending a birthday celebration for Mr. Arthur Beaty, in Dwfrig ward at Maesgwyn hospital, Brynceithin, who is celebrating his 100th birthday today. I am sure that the House will want to record its birthday greetings to him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

Yesterday, I read through three full files of letters and reports dealing only with Blackmill hospital and the work of the hospital league of friends under the chairmanship and stewardship of Councillor Mrs. Muriel Williams, MBE, JP. I was overwhelmed by the public response to fund-raising efforts to provide for the hospital so many extra facilities and needs not usually available from any other source. I commend Mrs. Williams and her committee for all their untiring efforts. Only last week my wife opened the league's summer fete, which raised well over £500 in one afternoon and was supported by hundreds of the valley's residents.

To view objectively the proposals to close Blackmill hospital, one has to consider the historical background and the significance of the hospital to the community that it serves. The hospital was built in 1903 by the Ogmore and Garw council for the treatment and nursing of infectious diseases. Until 1948 it was used mainly for this purpose, treating outbreaks of infectious diseases such as measles, whooping cough, chicken pox, scarlet fever and many others. An improved programme of immunisation and vaccination, coupled with advanced medical treatment for prevention, resulted in a fall in bed occupancy at the hospital. To improve occupancy, a pre-convalescent ward was established.

I should like to place on record my appreciation of the work of the Ogwr community health council — Chris Johnston, the Secretary, Megan Butcher, last year's chairman, and Jack Thomas, the present chairman,— and the efficent and constructive way they organised public meetings and a petition which carried 10,000 signatures. I object to the contemptuous way in which they have been treated by the health service's planning officer, Mr. D. M. Chapple. They were not kept fully informed of Welsh Office decisions.

I should like to read a letter dealing with a series of Welsh Office decisions which was sent to Mr. Boulton, the general manager of the Mid-Glamorgan health authority. It said:

"In my letter of 7 May I informed you that the Secretary of State has approved the first part of your proposals for the reorganisation of health services in Ogwr. The purpose of this letter is to tell you that he also accepts as part of that reorganisation your proposal to close Blackmill Hospital.

The hospital is obviously held in affection by many people in the area and the Secretary of State fully appreciates the regard in which the hospital is held and understands the feelings of those people in the community who have expressed concern at its future. In particular he was impressed by the sincerity of the Friends of Blackmill Hospital who presented officials with a petition to keep the Hospital open.

He has concluded nevertheless that the reorganisation of health services which your Authority has proposed are in the best interests of all the people in Ogwr."

The penultimate paragraph is the most important:

"The Secretary of State has noted that the Health Authority would prefer not to dispose of the site immediately, in order to allow further exploration of the potential for its reuse in the local interest. The Secretary of State, having noted the strong local affection for Blackmill Hospital, is agreeable to a delay in disposal, but being conscious of the cost of maintaining the site in a reasonable condition after closure, encourages the Health Authority to have concluded its considerations by 1 November 1985."

Earlier today the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), was congratulated by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hayries) on his 40 years' service to this House and to the nation. I urge hon. Members to read his article in today's edition of The Times and to reflect upon the achievements of the Labour Government of 1945. The Nye Bevans of this world, and others, fought long and hard to introduce the National Health Service. It is our duty and responsibility to protect this national asset and prevent the privatisation of medical care. Private medical care is escalating because American-based firms are falling over themselves to cash in on this gravy train.

Are the Government reducing the role of the National Health Service? Do they intend to provide only a substandard service for those who cannot find the cash to pay for private care? We will not tolerate this any further. We shall not allow these uncaring, unscrupulous monetarists to smash the National Health Service, as they have been trying to do since 1979. In June 1983 the Prime Minister said that the National Health Service was safe in her hands. Not only the Opposition but also, I believe, many Conservative Members doubt this.

I am sure that the Under-Secretary is not included in the real hard core of those whom I have just criticised. Therefore, I ask him to show a little compassion and to consider the proposal to salvage at least one hospital from the slaughter of the services that I have outlined by the area health authority. I ask him to consider the decision of the area health authority on 22 July 1985,

"that before taking steps to dispose of Blackmill Hospital and site they would look favourably at any constructive and feasible proposition to retain the hospital for the benefit of the community if such proposals were to be presented to them. The Secretary of State has allowed until November 1985 for such propositions to be presented to the Authority."

May I suggest to the Minister two areas which might be suitable for the undertaking of a feasibility study for the future use of hospital facilities by a local charitable organisation, which would be much-needed community projects. First, one ward could be converted into a flexible day care centre for the elderly. The advantages of such a centre would be to allow greater use of the facility and allow patients to remain in care for longer periods. Secondly, it could use another ward to provide a short-stay holiday home unit for the elderly. If such a short-stay unit were provided, it would go a long way towards allowing relatives some respite for a week or two and would encourage them to accept their family responsibilities. If the proposals were accepted by the health authority and the social services department, referrals could be agreed and funded by the DHSS. I am sure that my proposals would mean that the costings of Blackmill hospital for the year ended 13 March 1984 could be substantially reduced.

Last, but not least, the child welfare clinic, the chiropody clinic and other community-based functions are sited at the hospital. They were sited at the hospital because alternative accommodation was not available in the area. Those functions could be retained at the hospital. This local charitable organisation would be able to make repairs and renovations of a high standard without the liability of unreasonable cost.

Finally, may I ask the Minister to give some help to the socially and industrially deprived area of Ogmore by at least allowing this community-based charitable organisation to continue the essential work of Blackmill hospital. If he will do that, I shall willingly and eagerly wish him a pleasant and restful summer recess.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I am happy to join the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) in sending good wishes to his constituent, Mr. Arthur Beaty, on his 100th birthday. I also congratulate the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) on his 40 years' service to the House.

The House will be aware that the procedures relating to a hospital closure provide ample opportunity for up-to-date consideration of the proposal for change and of any viable alternatives. They applied in the Blackmill case. I must dissent from the hon. Gentleman and assert that we have noted local feeling, but the weight of reasoned argument on service needs must also be weighed. In this case, the balance lies in favour of the authority's proposal.

Blackmill hospital is a unit of 30 beds. In recent years it has provided a pre-convalescent facility, generally for elderly people, some of whom move on to other accommodation. As the hon. Gentleman said, the buildings date from 1903 and occupy a site of about two acres. No beds are designated for consultant supervision. Patients are supervised by general practitioners. Additionally, the hospital is formally described as an isolation facility for infectious diseases.

The health authority wishes to close Blackmill hospital, which costs about £250,000 a year to run. It judges that this revenue could most usefully be transferred as a contribution to the running costs of a reorganised service for Ogwr district, which includes comprehensive care of the elderly. Provision for the elderly would then make appropriate use of the Bridgend general and Maesgwyn hospitals, which are both near the new Princess of Wales hospital, which is just being commissioned. Whatever the hon. Gentleman may say, the fact is that the reorganisation will provide more beds for the elderly than are presently available. Therefore, it is not true to say that we and the health authority are reducing the number of beds available for the elderly.

The health authority has been thinking about the future of Blackmill hospital for some time. Its first consultative document on the proposed reorganisation of hospital services in the Ogwr health district was issued in July 1979. It drew a significant response during public consultation and the authority duly decided to delay making any firm decisions until much nearer the opening of the new Princess of Wales district general hospital.

I am sure that that approach was right, because the new Princess of Wales hospital at Bridgend will form the focal point of very substantially improved health services for the people of Ogwr. When it opens in October of this year, the new hospital will provide the most modern forms of health treatment. In many respects it will be second to none in Wales. Indeed, extra funds made available by the Welsh Office to the Mid-Glamorgan health authority reflect our strong desire to secure such major improvements in health care

At one point, the Mid-Glamorgan health authority expressed concern that existing guidance on cost allowances for a hospital of the size of the Princess of Wales did not fully recognise the special needs of the district. There was some feeling that this guidance would not permit the introduction of the most recent technological advances. However, I am happy to say that we were able to provide the required funding to satisfy the overall requirements at the new hospital. More than £6 million has been provided for up-to-date equipment items, and an extra allocation of just under £4.8 million recurring revenue moneys has been added to the health authority's allocation especially for the new district general hospital.

All of this is additional to money for the capital development, costing in excess of £13 million, so our commitment to funding the health services in Ogwr should be crystal clear and unmistakeable. But I want to say something in a little more detail about the effect that this multi-million pound investment will have upon the actual health services provided to the people of Ogwr. It is this that has conditioned the authority's approach to the future of Blackmill hospital.

It is axiomatic that services for the elderly should be provided on the soundest possible basis. The development of services for the elderly is given priority attention by my Department. Among other things, health authorities are required to reinvest "good management" efficiency savings amounting to 0.5 per cent. of their revenue allocations for the priority groups of elderly, mentally handicapped and mentally ill people, who are among the most vulnerable in our society.

In this case, I believe that the reorganised health services proposed for Ogwr are likely to be of real benefit to elderly people in the community over and above the services available already. The needs of the elderly in hospital do not just demand concentrated medical and nursing care. There is also a requirement for a range of other specialised services. We look for significant improvement in this area, because, without it, and without the well-judged service intervention that they can provide, elderly people would otherwise be unable to retain their health, their independence and thus the society of their family and friends. These specialised facilities are precisely those that are available at a general hospital and are unlikely to be available elsewhere.

In saying that I certainly do not mean to disparage the work of the staff at Blackmill hospital. Their devotion to their patients is widely known locally and very well appreciated. However, there can be no doubt that the facilities being made available at Bridgend general hospital, Quarella road, as well as in the associated Maesgwyn hospital, are both superior in themselves and capable of meeting the total needs of the area in a way that Blackmill cannot.

That said, we have agreed with a suggestion from the Mid-Glamorgan health authority that any alternative proposal for the use of the resource represented by Blackmill should be given very careful consideration before any decision is taken on disposal of the hospital site. We fully recognise the great affection which the local community has for the hospital, and we are conscious of the excellent voluntary support that it has received. There is no intention to overlook the service that either has been or could be provided to the elderly at Blackmill. But it is up to the authority to see whether local initiative could support the development of a viable plan for some further future use. I am sure that it will be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the ideas that he has presented this morning and that it will consider what he has had to say.

The closure of Blackmill will, of course, have consequences for the pattern of service provision generally within the area. For example, general practitioner services are themselves very significant in providing a primary health care service for the elderly. Here, it is the intention that general practitioner beds should be located near to the diagnostic and treatment facilities at Bridgend. This cannot but have a positive influence on the effectiveness of the GP services.

Again, the treatment of infectious diseases will also be subject to reorganisation. When the Blackmill hospital was originally built by the Ogmore and Garw council it was for the care of patients suffering with infectious diseases. Since then there has been a massive decline in the incidence and severity of these diseases to such an extent that a major isolation facility is no longer necessary. The new Princess of Wales hospital has itself been planned to enable the proper treatment of infectious diseases to be undertaken.

It may be said that, despite the care with which the Mid-Glamorgan health authority has planned and consulted, the new arrangements for the whole of Ogwr, which themselves imply the closure of Blackmill, should still not go ahead. It may be said that the 30 beds and Blackmill hospital should be retained. In that event, the further development at Bridgend general hospital about which I have spoken would have to be materially revised. Retention of Blackmill would mean that the resources expended on it would not be available for use elsewhere in Ogwr. This would affect the area plan, and some element of the intended provision for the elderly—planned to be in the region of 120 beds at Bridgend—would have to be omitted to balance the supply against likely demand. By retaining a relatively isolated GP unit, the planned capacity to provide comprehensive care for the elderly would be limited. Proposals for providing GP access to major diagnostic facilities and other specialist support at Bridgend general would be affected adversely.

It is difficult to see how any authority could justify having such beds in isolation from major support and acute specialties and outpatient services. Nor do I think that even the most ardent supporter of the notion of retaining Blackmill hospital would suggest that such a GP service at Blackmill should actually be replaced at Bridgend. Moreover, there are clear advantages of maintaining beds for the elderly in the most central and accessible location in relation to population. Bridgend general meets this requirement far more effectively than does Blackmill.

Again, so far as beds for the elderly in general are concerned, there must be doubt that Blackmill hospital could possibly hope to offer a service to elderly people of Ogwr superior to that proposed for the new Bridgend general and Maesgwyn hospital. The whole concept of the care envisaged for the elderly in Ogwr is to create a large number of beds in Bridgend with immediate access to major diagnostic and rehabilitative facilities. I make no apology in supporting Mid-Glamorgan health authority in working towards positive patterns of care for the elderly and for Ogwr as a whole. The most fruitful way ahead can only be charted by developing facilities around the Princess of Wales hospital.

I know that some of the few elderly people cared for at Blackmill hospital will initially be concerned at the thought of moving to an alternative location. It will of course be up to the health authority to ensure that this is managed with the care and sensitivity that we have come to expect from staff at Blackmill. Patients will fortunately not be asked to move great distances. Bridgend is only four and a half miles away and Maesgwyn hospital is only three miles away. At either place the distance from close relatives and friends will not differ substantially from that which exists now. They will be assured that all modern techniques available for their treatment and well-being would be close at hand.

All these developments in Ogwr take place against a resource background which Labour Members consistently refuse to recognise and occasionally misrepresent. As I have said many times in the House, and elsewhere, the Health Service in Wales has enjoyed a 16·3 per cent. increase in available growth resources between 1979-80 and 1985-86. This is after taking account of the effects of inflation, and 1983 public expenditure reductions. It is this very growth that has enabled authorities like Mid-Glamorgan to begin to address the problems of old and relatively expensive facilities, and to begin the business of moving to more modern and effective ones.

I do not say that these adjustments can be made easily. They demand great sensitivity, careful planning and considerable thought. There are hard choices to be made, but they cannot be avoided. On any objective standard the improvement in performance across the whole Health Service in Wales since 1979 is striking. Many more patient cases are being dealt with quickly and with a greater range of treatments than ever before, but it will not be possible for authorities like Mid-Glamorgan to continue to enhance their performance—to tackle the problems that confront the service—if scarce resources are used in running facilities that are relatively ineffective in cost and service terms. To cavil at this is simply to close one's eyes to the realities of Health Service planning and resource needs. We cannot take a relaxed view of any arrangement that uses resources ineffectively and thus diverts them from more and better patient care, particularly when modern, improved and accessible services are available

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I very well recognise that the pressures on the funds that he has made available to the district health authorities are always strong. They are caused, for example, by new technologies and new methods of treatment as well as by pay increases. On this last point I will only say that these have been discussed at the recent round of annual reviews conducted by the executive committee of the health policy board within our Department.

There will be an opportunity for further discussion during the course of today when chairmen have one of their occasional meetings with the Secretary of State. Naturally, I cannot anticipate the course of this discussion, or indeed the Secretary of State's decisions as regards funding for 1986-87. What I will say is that we look to health authorities to continue to take effective measures to get the best value for money in the interests of patient care. I cannot imagine that anyone who works in the NHS would want to side-step that imperative. It is essential to the future of the service overall.

I do not in any way discount the financial and other problems of transition that Mid-Glamorgan faces. They confront all authorities to some degree. As things stand, Mid-Glamorgan has benefited from significant growth in its discretionary revenue resources in recent years. Moreover, additional cash loans of some £3 million in 1984-85 and £2·2 million in 1985-86 have been made to help the authority, which has also benefited from special central funding for particular service developments. We are also assisting a consultancy study designed to help the authority to manage the way ahead.

All of this is in support of the considerable efforts made by the authority over recent years to tackle the problems with which it is confronted. It is important to see the future of services for the elderly in Ogwr, and indeed the decision in respect of Blackmill hospital, in that context.

I do not believe that Mid-Glamorgan will be assisted in its effort—which will be to the long-term benefit of all those served by the authority—if every well-founded proposal for change is characterised as "cutting" health services, when in fact such changes represent further significant improvements in patient care. That can only reduce public confidence in the credibility of the service for both the present and the future—to the detriment of patients and the dedicated staff who work in the service.

I conclude by returning to the work of the staff at Blackmill hospital. I am sure that they will help in making the transitional period implicit in the transfer of services to a new location as smooth as possible. The staff's reputation for care gives me the strongest possible hope that the transition will be managed well.

I also acknowledge the work done by individual members of the local community and members of voluntary groups that have taken an interest in Blackmill over the years and the considerable support that they have given to the hospital. I hope that that goodwill will find its proper outlet in the facilities at Bridgend and elsewhere in Ogwr.

Southampton Economic Development Corporation

1 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I welcome the opportunity to draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to a sinister new development in local government—the abuse of companies limited by guarantee. The creation of such companies is often no more than a fraudulent sham and the use to which they can be put is grossly anti-democratic, an outrageous abuse of ratepayers' funds and a recipe for corruption on a massive scale. As not only ratepayers' but taxpayers' money is being siphoned into these companies, I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary shares my anxiety.

I shall illustrate the argument by referring to the recent establishment by Southampton city council of a company limited by guarantee, the Southampton Economic Development Corporation, which was incorporated on 20 March this year and has the widest possible terms in its memorandum of association. The report submitted to the city council said:

"A company which carries on an activity not permitted by its memorandum will be acting ultra vires and that activity will be void. It is therefore important that the memorandum must be drafted in the widest possible terms to enable a company to carry on any activity which it might wish to do in the future."

The objects of SEDCO enable it to do anything calculated to assist and promote the economic, scientific, technological and social development of Southampton; to carry on research; to stage conferences, exhibitions or plays and to provide leisure activities and amenities; to deal in property; to invest, borrow and deal with money and to take shares in other companies. The city secretary reported that that was not an exhaustive list of the company's powers and that there was also a blanket clause enabling the company to carry on any activity that is deemed to be incidental, necessary, expedient or conducive to its other specified powers.

Therefore, Southampton Economic Development Corporation has powers that are far wider and more extensive than those of the city council itself. However, unlike the city council, the economic development corporation is devoid of public accountability. Its members and directors are appointed by the city council, but need not be elected members of that council. Once appointed, they are accountable to the company and not to the public.

The public and press are denied access to agendas, supporting papers and minutes, thereby being denied all the public safeguards in the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985.

The company board meets in private and, most sinister of all, councillors who are not on the board are denied access to information. Board members may be paid fees and the board may be so constituted that minority parties on the city council are not represented on it.

Although directors are governed by company legislation and the company must keep accounts and make and file an annual return, the controls on members of the board are a far cry from open accountability to the electorate and the public. Yet the company is wholly dependent on public funds or the guarantee of such funds.

Within a few days of incorporation, Southampton Economic Development Corporation was given £450,000 by the council. The payment was made under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, which enables local authorities to spend up to the product of a 2p rate.

The product of a 2p rate in Southampton is almost £700,000, but by the end of the last financial year only £250,000 had been spent. The remainder, instead of being returned to the ratepayers, was siphoned into the new company. All that the public know is that the money was invested on behalf of the company on 29 March, the day on which it was transferred. From now on, the ratepayers of Southampton have no control over the way in which that money is spent.

Not content with a mere £450,000, the directors of the company immediately started investigating ways in which millions of pounds could be produced for the company. The ingenious and sinister proposal that was considered was a back-to-back loan by which the company would borrow up to £3 million from a bank on the basis that the city council would deposit an equivalent sum with that bank. In that way, the council would not be deemed to be spending money, but would potentially be liable to use the money to meet the company's debts under the guarantee. Meanwhile, the company, meeting in secret, would be able to spend millions of pounds as it wanted.

The sham nature of that proposal is clear from a report to the directors that was given by Mr. Grey, who is not only a director of the company but the treasurer of the city council. The first sentence of his report reads:

"When considering the ways in which the City Council could provide funds for SEDCO, it was clearly important to bear in mind the limitations imposed by Statute and by Government regulations."

It may be apparent from that sentence that Mr. Grey was finding it difficult to separate his responsibilities as treasurer of the city council from the role which he was apparently playing at the time of making his report, that of a director of the corporation. Mr. Grey continued:

"If the revenue reserve for capital purposes of the Council continues to be the sole source of finance for this company, the present City Council policies, if maintained, would ensure that funds would be available for four to five years at the rate of £350,000 a year."

That was not enough, apparently, for the directors of the company. They wanted to consider alternative provision, and the city treasurer reported that he had conducted negotiations with two banks, Hambros and the Trustee Savings bank, and said that, in consideration of an investment by the council in the bank, the bank would make a loan to the Southampton Economic Development Corporation. He said in his report to the board of directors:

"An arrangement of this sort ensures that there is no direct link between the two transactions, the bank loan to SEDCO and the City Council's investment with the bank, both being in the normal course of business."

In my submission, that was nothing more than a sham, because it was clear that the bank would lend money to the corporation only if the city council agreed to deposit money with that bank, so giving a sort of back-to-back arrangement.

The report to the corporation went on to point out the costs of such loans. It said that the interest would be £130,000 a year for each £1 million borrowed. In other words, it would be up to £390,000. It went on:

"It is extremely unlikely that interest commitments will be met in the early years of operation, and the City Council will, therefore, need to act as a guarantor. In addition, provision will need to be made for repayment of the loan principal."

Mr. Grey said that the Hambros offer would cause little difficulty, because the loan would not fall due until the end of the seven-year loan period. That was, of course, a long way ahead for those currently running the council, although it would be a potential millstone around the necks of Southampton's ratepayers.

At the end of his quite long report, Mr. Grey told the directors:

"On balance, I would suggest that taking a loan at the present time is premature."

One of the directors on the board was a Conservative councillor, Mike Andrews, an accountant. He thought that what was being proposed was of dubious legality, and he expressed the intention to vote against the proposal at the board meeting. He said that he would point out to the bank which was thinking of entering into this back-to-back arrangement that it might be entering into a matter of doubtful legality.

Within 24 hours, the city council decided that Councillor Andrews should be dismissed from the board. A special agenda item referred to using the powers in the Local Government Act to deal with a matter of "extreme urgency". The mayor stated:

"It has been brought to my attention by the leader of the council"—

I do not know where that leaves the question of confidentiality, because it appears that the leader of the council, who is a member of SEDCO's board, is free to discuss matters that take place at board meetings with his Socialist colleagues outside, but can criticise someone who is not a member of the Socialist party if he acts similarly.

The mayor went on:

"Councillor Andrews who is a council appointed director of this corporation has indicated his intention to take action by writing to certain banking organisations on lines which could detrimentally affect the board's ability to satisfactorily progress negotiations. This action, if carried through, could be construed as directly incompatible with continued membership of the board of directors."

The mayor said that he thought that the matter should be dealt with without delay. As a result, the council on which the Socialists have a majority voted to dismiss Councillor Andrews from the board. That meant that one of the two Conservative councillors who had been elected to the board was dismissed.

The corporation is so rotten that it appears that anyone who wishes to scrutinise what happens is likely to lose his position on the board. It is possible that no minority party representative will be allowed to serve on the board unless he agrees to be a silent stooge and cipher for the Socialists. As with all authoritarian and undemocratic councils, the voice of a minority is left with the expensive option of litigation in which the opponents will be funded by the ratepayers and the public purse.

The officers of the council are involved as directors of SEDCO. They are being put into an invidious position. The city treasurer owes a fiduciary duty to the ratepayers in his own right and, as an employee of the local authority, he should give his working time and undivided allegiance to that authority. What is he to do when conflicts of interest and duty arise? How can he remain, and be seen to remain, impartial, objective, politically neutral and professionally independent? It seems that pressure was imposed to make him agree to enter into a £3 million loan, despite his reservations. It has been suggested that another council officer has been faced with pressure to doctor the minutes of the board meeting to avoid potential embarrassment to the leader of the Socialist city council.

It seems that nothing can prevent the corporation from incurring liabilities of countless millions of pounds which ratepayers will have to meet in the future. Short of rate capping, there is no limited liability for ratepayers. They are rather like names at Lloyd's: they will have to pay up, if called upon to do so, in relation to bad decisions over which they have no control.

In the limited time available, I cannot go into the temptation of corruption to which directors of such companies limited by guarantee may be exposed. Money taken through the rates from commercial and residential ratepayers in Southampton can, through the device of this company, effectively be spent on anything that the company directors think fit. If, for example, the Widdicombe committee recommends a clampdown on local authority propaganda — I hope that it will — SEDCO will be able, under its memorandum, to spend ratepayers' money instead.

If a trade union or individual agrees to give a fixed sum of money to the Southampton Labour party, and is then to be rewarded with a soft grant or loan from the corporation, how will the press or public be able to learn about it? There is no way that the press or public would be able to learn about such matters. That is why I say that it is a recipe for corruption. I feel that all right-thinking people would regard putting local authority money and property beyond the direct control of the local authority as dubious in the extreme, and depositing or charging public money as security for the debts or other obligations of the company as grossly immoral.

Unfortunately, there are now elements in local government that are not right-thinking and are prepared to bend whatever rules and conventions exist to further their own party political objectives. The members of the board of the company have no experience whatever in investing in businesses, which is apparently the purported purpose of setting up the developmemt corporation. It will take money from existing thriving businesses in Southampton and give it to dubious businesses that may well not survive and are likely to collapse, but only after a good deal of ratepayers' money has been poured into the board.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give a message of hope to those who are desperately trying to resist these sinister developments in local government.

1.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) for raising the question of the activities of the Southampton Economic Development Corporation. The specific case that he has raised in turn raises general issues of principle concerning the activities of local authorities. He touched on the potential conflict of interest facing local government officers who find themselves acting for the council but also for bodies that are at arm's length.

My hon. Friend raised a fundamental issue that we have asked the Widdicombe committee to look at: whether the premise on which Parliament gave local authorities very wide discretionary powers — in the belief that they would honour the convention to use them responsibly— is still valid at a time when, unfortunately, a growing number of local authority councillors exploit to the maximum the framework of the law to use ratepayers' funds for purposes that were never intended by Parliament. One of the most valuable things that I can do is to refer my hon. Friend's speech to the Widdicombe inquiry, together with any supportive evidence that he has, particularly from the minutes of the board.

My hon. Friend likened the Southampton ratepayers, whom he represents so ably, to those who are named at Lloyd's, but if one is named at Lloyd's one has the option at the beginning of deciding whether to enter into that obligation. Short of moving out of Southampton—and denying themselves the benefit of my hon. Friend's representation in this House—those who live there do not have the option that members of Lloyd's have of deciding whether to take on a particular liability.

My hon. Friend raised several matters on which I am not able to comment in detail. I should like to reflect on them and seek further advice from my Department, but it might be helpful if I outlined to my hon. Friend and the House the Government's general philosophy about the relationship between local government and the funding of economic activity in a particular local authority area.

I think my hon. Friend will agree that responsible local authorities have a legitimate role to play in the economic development of their district. When my hon. Friend was leader of Wandsworth council, he worked closely with my Department to bring to fruition many worthwhile urban programme schemes directed at creating employment and improving Wandsworth as a place in which to invest. But Wandsworth council was answerable for its proportion of the programme, and there was the element of accountability, whereas in Southampton the link of accountability is somewhat weakened.

My Department's 1982 consultation paper, "Local authority assistance to industry and commerce", stated:

> "Local authorities have a key contribution to make to the development of small firms—and indeed to the encouragement of enterprise generally—through the proper exercise of their statutory powers, and especially in ensuring that enterprises are not unduly hampered by bureaucratic delays, over restrictive planning policies or unnecessarily heavy rate burdens".

In the past weeks two major Government reports have been published. The White Paper "Lifting the Burden" specifically drew attention to how local authorities can help local enterprise to flourish by minimising controls and bureaucracy and by adopting a positive approach through the planning system. Secondly, the publication "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs" which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has sent to all local authorities outlines one important area of economic growth—tourism—and the important role that local government has to play in developing it.

I must qualify that support with a reservation which I am sure will meet with my hon. Friend's agreement: that local authorities must avoid conflict with central Government's priorities towards regional and inner city development and the control of public expenditure generally.

Local authorities are not capable of taking on and should not be expected to take on the whole burden of reviving the economy. They must work with the grain of national policies and not cut across them. Assisting industry locally should not be used as an excuse for experimenting with doctrinaire economic theories, imposing political conditions on employers, pursuing political propaganda campaigns or side-stepping expenditure controls.

If ratepayers' funds were used through the board to fund party political campaigns, every right-minded person would see that as an abuse of those funds. In the end, a high-spending policy, brought about by a local authority, designed to revive the local economy, will inevitably be self-defeating because of the high rates burden which is added to the costs of local firms.

The Government have also made it clear that they are not opposed in principle to the setting up of enterprise boards. They are still a fairly new feature, and are one way in which local authorities can organise themselves to help industry. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government will watch carefully how they develop — the crucial point that he made — and how the parent local authorities exercise control over their activities. My Department has already learned a great deal about the enterprise boards funded by the GLC and the metropolitan counties because we have power and control over their expenditure, which is exercised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Some of those boards have adopted sensible, commercially minded approaches. I am sure that my hon. Friend does not object to that. I have to answer another debate later about the role of the Greater London Enterprise Board. Enterprise boards can offer potential advantages and, as my hon. Friend said, potential disadvantages. For example, an enterprise board, by concentrating local authority services in one body, separated from day-to-day political pressures, may be able to work more closely with the private sector, build up its own special expertise and identify gaps in local private sector provision whether in sites, services or capital. A body operating like that, using commercial criteria but with a regard to local employment needs, seems to me capable of fulfilling a useful role, not least in fostering the birth and growth of small firms in inner city areas.

There are obvious dangers, as my hon. Friend said, if the board diverts local government from what it can do to help in basic policy areas, in assembling land for example; or if it leads to additional bureaucracy with its own priorities, merely adding to industry's rate burden and imposing excessive conditions on the firms receiving aid. Problems would also arise if the scale and nature of the operations worked against national or inner-city priorities. Those dangers, while not inevitable, depend upon the guidelines that are set for the board by the elected members, how its performance is monitored and how it is made accountable.

As I said a moment ago, the Government have set up a committee of inquiry under the chairmanship of David Widdicombe to consider a number of aspects of local authority affairs, including the use of local authorities' discretionary spending power under section 137. As my hon. Friend made clear, it was the use of section 137 which enabled Southampton at the end of the year to use the margin available to it to fund the enterprise board. The Widdicombe inquiry will be looking at the clarification of the limits and the conditions governing the existing powers under section 137. There is a particular reference to bodies set up and largely funded by local authorities. Therefore, I expect the activities mentioned by my hon. Friend to figure quite prominently in the committee's deliberations.

My hon. Friend will understand that we want to have the benefit of the views of the inquiry, as an independent, impartial body, on the difficult issues that he mentioned before we can consider what policy changes are appropriate.

I come now to particular issues concerning the Southampton city council enterprise board, SEDCO. One of my hon. Friend's concerns is that it could be used to evade the normal Government controls on local authority expenditure. He described the transaction of the £3 million deposit with the £3 million advance.

It is certainly true that there are no constraints on the amount of money that an enterprise board may spend, other than those that apply to any commercial undertaking. Such expenditure is outside Government control on local authorities and could be brought within it only by primary legislation.

Grants to the enterprise board under section 137 would score against the authority's prescribed expenditure allocation. Likewise, revenue grants by Southampton to its board would count towards total expenditure for target purposes. My hon. Friend touched on the guarantees to the enterprise board and the potential long-term commitments that might be inherited by a city council of a different complexion.

As a matter of principle, I welcome private sector capital injections to a board as an indication that it is acting along sound commercial lines. The guarantee provided by the local authority does not score against expenditure until the guarantee is called. If it was called, a guarantee of a revenue nature would count towards total expenditure, but a guarantee of a capital nature would be prescribed expenditure only if the authority thereby came into beneficial occupation of a capital asset.

My Department is now reviewing the whole system of capital expenditure controls in consultation with the local authority associations, and the question of local authority controlled companies will be examined. It is a complex area and I listened with special interest to what my hon. Friend had to say about Councillor Michael Andrews, who was appointed to the board by the city council but subsequently dismissed in the circumstances outlined by my hon. Friend.

If Councillor Andrews was simply being censured for acting responsibly as a guardian of ratepayers, that is something that I would roundly condemn. I would want more details about the case before going further than that; however, there are grounds for anxiety. It raises the point of principle, on which I touched earlier, of the conflict of interest between accountability to the local authority and accountability to the enterprise board to which one is appointed as a director.

In the light of what my hon. Friend has said, we will continue to maintain a close watching brief on the operation of the boards, not least the one in Southampton. The points that my hon. Friend has raised are material to that monitoring exercise. When the recommendations of the Widdicombe inquiry are available, and when the exercise on capital expenditure controls is finalised we will be in a better position to decide whether any changes are required to the legal framework in which they operate.

In the meantime, I commend my hon. Friend for his diligence—which we have grown to expect from him—in bringing to public attention the potential abuse of the position in Southampton. My Department will keep a close watch on the position that he outlined.

Borders Region (Social Fund Assistance)

1.28 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of the effect on the Borders region of the European Community's decision to withdraw priority status for social fund assistance.

I apologise to the Minister for having interposed myself between him and his holiday. However, I hope that he will agree that this is a subject worth considering because it has been causing some concern to my local authority. I hope that we shall have a useful half hour's debate.

New guidelines were issued by the European Community on 30 April this year on the management of the European social fund for the years 1986-88. These new guidelines exclude the Borders region from priority for most, though not all, forms of European social fund assistance. Before the change in the guidelines the Borders region was eligible for most types of European social fund assistance, because it came within the "priority" region which at that time encompassed the whole of Scotland.

The EC has now decided to change the geographical coverage of European fund assistance to cover smaller units based on local authority regions and counties which are undertaking industrial restructuring or have a particularly high unemployment rate or, alternatively, many long-term unemployed. Since the guidelines change, only two local authority regions in Scotland are without European social fund assistance priority—the Grampians and my own region of the Borders.

It has been made clear to the Government by me and by my right hon Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) as well as by people in the Borders region that employment by itself is not a good measure of economic well-being in a rural area such as the Borders, to the exclusion of everything else. The total number of unemployed in the Borders region in June 1985 was 3,460, giving an average rate of 9·1 per cent. I fully accept that in other parts of the country unemployment is much higher. Nevertheless, it is worth noting that there has been a slight but significant increase in the level of unemployment since June 1984, when it was 8·6 per cent. That is the direction in which the trend is going and it is causing concern in the Borders.

Within the regional average there are wide local variations in unemployment rates. For example, in the Berwickshire travel-to-work area within the Borders region the June 1985 unemployment rate was 13·3 per cent., which is only slightly lower than the current Scottish average and slightly above the current United Kingdom average. The situation in Berwickshire will deteriorate still further after the civil work stage at the nearby power station at Torness is completed. It seems unfair for the Borders, and Berwickshire in particular, to have European social fund priority withdrawn when other parts of Scotland with lower unemployment rates are being allowed to retain priority status.

The main thrust of the European social fund objective is to provide for the needs of two classes of people, those unemployed under the age of 25 and long-term unemployed. The April 1985 figures for the Borders show that one third of those out of work locally are under 25 years of age. In addition, the number of local long-term unemployed has quadrupled since the late 1970s. In the Borders, 29 per cent. of the unemployed have been out of work for more than a year. In the bigger industrial areas, such as Hawick, 34 per cent. of those out of work have been unemployed for more than a year.

There are other factors that the Government should recognise when they take policy decisions, whether exclusively or in concert with the European Community, about the status afforded to different regions under any development or regional assistance scheme.

The continuous loss of population from areas such as the Borders is a problem. If those in the economically active age groups find difficulty in getting work, they move elsewhere. The Minister may take the view—and it is a view that others Ministers have taken—that there is nothing wrong with that. People may well get on their bikes, but one must consider the enormous problems created by imbalanced population distribution and the knock-on effects in other parts of the community when working age families start to leave the area in significant numbers. One very quickly realises the high price that has to be paid when active families quit the area.

The lack of employment opportunity is another factor which must be taken into account. The regional council in the Borders is doing its utmost to encourage and promote new, diversified industry to create new jobs from within the region and to encourage inward investment. I am pleased to say that it has been extremely successful, but changes, such as the new directive issued in April, mean that the council will be operating in future with one hand tied behind its back. I suggest to the Minister that the high incidence of low pay is another important factor in the Borders economy. Many families there need to have both parents working if they are to have a tolerable standard of living. The existence of two wage earners in a family in other parts of the country often signifies a desire to indulge in luxurious living, like the soft-living people who live in the south-east of England, but in such places as the Borders it is necessary to have both parents working to enable families to keep their heads above water.

There are also difficulties in getting guidance and advice to those out of work in a geographically disparate region such as the Borders. There is no access to commercial job agencies, as there often is in urban areas.

I have been pressing the Government, principally the Minister's colleagues in the Scottish Office, ever since I was elected to the House to recognise that areas such as the Borders have problems. They may not be the same problems as those in the more urban areas and they may be less easily quantified and recognised, but in their own way they are as real and as urgent. In my opinion, they are frequently ignored by Governments.

I strongly urge the Minister to hold urgent talks with his opposite numbers in the Scottish Office. I understand that it is not entirely within his responsibility, but I ask him to discuss these matters with his colleagues with a view to bringing forward early proposals to set up a rural development plan that could be used in conjunction with the Scottish Development Agency's powers and those available already to regional council planners to give a real boost and stimulus to appropriate types of commerce and industry in the landward areas of the United Kingdom.

I accept that the grand, capital-intensive projects that have been considered in regional development schemes in the past may not be appropriate to smaller areas, but there is every opportunity to set up a sensitive and sensible amount of programming and planning within the remit of a rural development plan. It would not cost an enormous sum of money, but it would make a significant difference to the economic activity in such places as the Borders. In my view, no other single initiative could do more to generate real and beneficial economic activity in rural areas.

I remind the Minister, because he is responsible for the Department of Employment, that we in Scotland do not have the benefit of an organisation such as COSIRA, which has set up a rural development area south of the border in Northumberland. From north of the border we look across with envious eyes to what is happening there. Real and positive developments are taking place. The position is made worse from our point of view because Border Television straddles the border area. I get nightly reports on activities in north Northumberland, and my constituents telephone me asking why I am not getting this for them. It does nothing but engender and foster nationalism of the very worst sort, and the Government ignore that at their peril. The work that COSIRA has been doing is commendable. There is a great deal to be said for it, and it should be mirrored north of the border. If we had it, it would go a long way to mitigate the effect of the withdrawal of European social fund assistance.

The Borders lost its assisted area status in August 1982. It meant, among other things, that the Borders was no longer eligible for assistance from the European regional development fund. The loss of priority for European social fund assistance means that the region no longer has effective access to the most important forms of EEC funds available to local authorities. I am aware that restricted eligibility to European social fund assistance still obtains, but my local authority reports to me that it is difficult to use the categories that remain available because they are so very restricted.

I am also aware that to date no real use has been made of the European social fund's schemes. The Borders region has not been able to benefit from the funds but it had begun to mount a series of training initiatives for about 300 unemployed persons through the Borders college of further education. They would have been looking for financial assistance from the European social fund. It is a great tragedy that these efforts, which were well advanced, may be prejudiced if not entirely thwarted by the decision to withdraw priority status from the Borders region.

The Minister therefore owes us answers to a few salient questions. First, what influence, if any, do the Government have over the Commission in Brussels when it takes decisions of this kind? I am as ardent a European as the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, but nothing is more likely to sour pro-European feelings than decisions of this kind being visited upon us. I quote from The Scotsman of 12 June 1985 and pray in aid the Conservative Member of Parliament for the European seat of South of Scotland who said:

"According to the Commission's own table of areas with regional problems, the Borders come within the top one fifth, along with regions like Tayside, Central, Fife and Lothians. There must therefore be evidence for including the Borders on the list of regions qualifying for ESF's assistance."

Since the regional authority, the local Members of Parliament and the European Member of Parliament agree that the fund needs to be retained, what influence, if any, do the Government have over the Commission?

Secondly, what representations were made by the Minister on this issue? I accept that negotiations with the authorities in Brussels do not revolve around the needs of Hawick and that policy decisions have to be taken on a much wider basis than that. However, the Government should have considered the implications for regions such as my own and for Grampian when the strategic decision was taken, which predated the April announcement, to withdraw priority status from these two regions.

Finally, will the Minister give an assurance that, if he cannot deliver a rural development plan and if he is unable to have discussions with his colleagues in the Scottish Office about a rural development set-up in Scotland, he will seek to have the Borders region reinstated as an area that qualifies for European social fund grants? Because of the problems faced by 300 youngsters who had expected to be provided with extra assistance for the employment projects of the Borders college of further education, can the Minister assure us that the Government will consider the problems caused by the withdrawal of European social fund assistance? Nevertheless, I hope that he will be able to say something positive about the establishment of a rural fund for the Borders area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has not interrupted my holiday. It was not supposed to start until next week. In fact it is being interrupted by other matters. One of the encouraging aspects of being an Employment Minister is that not only is one able to listen and pay a great deal of attention to representations but one is also able to learn about success stories in the various regions of the United Kingdom. Too often we refer only to the failures. The hon. Gentleman has done well to point to many of the successes in his constituency and in the Borders region. I hope the message will go out that, even if he does not get what he is asking for from the European social fund, although Ministers may occasionally have to say no, we are just as keen as is he to ensure that the 300 young people to whom he referred are provided with the best possible opportunities. All those with the power to influence events —those on the regional council, Members of Parliament and those in statutory or voluntary organisations, or in commerce and the public sector — should try in every way to encourage people to do more for themselves and for others. The idea of such a self-improvement society unites most hon. Members. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) here. There is hardly a Scottish debate in the House without his presence, and often his interventions.

In simple terms, special schemes to meet needs are bound to create problems. Last night, I replied to a debate about the definition of a travel-to-work area. It was said that if a ward could be placed in a different travel-to-work area, extra help would be available. With any scheme people on one side of a boundary say, "We want to be on the other side because our problems are worse than others realise." In the Borders, incomes are lower than they are in some areas. The hon. Gentleman said that that should be taken into account when looking for priority areas under the European social fund. I would not claim to be an expert on whether it is taken sufficiently into account, but if it was given a higher weighting than the unemployment figures I could not guarantee that the Borders would come top of the list for receiving more favourable consideration.

The Government make representations to the European Commission, and we have views on some areas which we believe, rightly, should be included for priority treatment. The Borders is not at the top of that list. Other areas are in a much worse position than the Borders. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will realise that, however persuasively he has made their case, I must say bluntly that the Borders does not come top of the list of areas that should be given the highest priority. I hope that they will realise that we must work out our priorities and try to do something for the worst afflicted areas first. No doubt all of us would wish to treat the entire country in the same way, but if we did that we might lose assistance. We must exercise some common sense.

The hon. Gentleman asked about our influence with the Commission. I should tell him that the Commission has the legal right and, I expect, the duty under article 6 of the Council decision on the tasks of the social fund to set the priorities for assistance from the fund for each financial year by means of guidelines. The priority areas are part of those guidelines. Member states, including the United Kingdom, are consulted about the contents of the guidelines before publication, and although the Commission will listen to representations that we make, it is not legally bound to accept them. It is responsible for making the final decision. We put in strong representations on behalf of the areas that we believe should be included, and we must then wait to see what the Commission says. If it says something that we believe to be illogical or inconsistent, we can return to the Commission and say so.

It is worth remembering that the United Kingdom does relatively well from the social fund. That is because we deserve to do well. However, we also try to ensure that we take advantage of all the opportunities available to us. The guidelines are there for a purpose — to meet special needs—and if we can organise ourselves and put in the appropriate applications, we shall do well. Those who do not do what the social fund is designed to achieve will not do as well. Occasionally, we are unhappy with changes in allocations, but perhaps any comment about that should be left for another time.

I pay tribute to the officials in the Department of Employment who deal with social fund matters. They have a high reputation with Commission officials in Brussels for the quality of their work and for their knowledge of what we and the Commission are trying to do. They also have a good reputation among applicants from the United Kingdom for their helpfulness and knowledge. That is well reflected in the number of allocations made by the fund to the United Kingdom during the past few years. I should tell the hon. Gentleman that anyone who is thinking of developing a scheme should contact the European social fund section of the Department of Employment. Even without priority status, there are opportunities to help people to put in applications that meet some of the other guidelines.

It is worth saying — and not too loudly — that I suspect that the changes in the guidelines for the European social fund will make virtually no difference to the Borders region. In future, people may think that the schemes that they have worked out would have been accepted under the old arrangements, but that is looking some way forward. In another debate, which did not come off, another region would have been mentioned which thought that the changes were frightful. That case was not precisely the same, but even under the changes it got twice as much in the subsequent year as in the previous year. Therefore, the changes are not quite as bad as they appear.

I should like to answer some other questions that the hon. Gentleman asked towards the end of his speech. First, he asked what the Government were doing about the position of the Borders in the priority list. We have made it clear to the Commission that we disagree with some parts of the new priority list. We shall continue to make representations. Frankly, that does not mean that we believe that the Borders has been unfairly treated in its position on the priority list. It is worth noting the unemployment rates in some of the new priority areas—for example, 11·3 per cent. in Derbyshire, 12·4 per cent. in Lincolnshire, 10·7 per cent. in Nottingham and 14·6 per cent. in the Isle of Wight. Although I am not going into the details of the level of income and the difficulties of a relatively small population, well dispersed, I think that most people regard it as reasonably fair that there should be some order of priorities.

The reason for having priority regions is that the social fund supports employment and training schemes in the member states, and is invariably oversubscribed. Many of us would have views on the balance of spending in the European Community, but given the size of the social fund as it is now, there is a need for priorities. To ensure that the money available goes to the areas of greatest need, regions with the highest unemployment are given priority for funding. There is a more restricted range of employment and training schemes supported in non-priority regions, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged.

How are priority regions determined? Before the fund review undertaken by the Council of Ministers in 1983, they were defined in the United Kingdom as standard regions with the highest unemployment. The term "standard region" could have been better phrased because the whole of Scotland was regarded as a single standard region and given priority status. Those standard regions were considered too large because, as the hon. Gentleman said, pockets within them that might be seen as having lower priority qualified and some areas where unemployment was high were not in standard regions. The new system allows fund aid to be more precisely targeted, although not as much as some people would like. A balance needed to be struck between targeting aid and the administrative nightmare of splitting the Community into thousands of small areas.

The Commission proposed that the new system should be based on a statistical mechanism. In the United Kingdom, at county or regional level, it would list areas on a hierarchical index with those with the highest unemployment and lowest income placed at the top and those with the lowest unemployment and the highest income at the bottom. Then it would be necessary to find the appropriate cut-off point to determine who had high priority status. That is self-evident.

There has been a delay in introducing the new system because of normal difficulties in working out the statistical mechanism. The Commission was not able to introduce the league table system until 1986, old priority regions having been retained on a transitional basis for 1984 and 1985. Although the final statistical mechanism has not yet been agreed by the Council of Ministers, the Commission considers the system equitable enough for introduction in the next round of applications and the Government agree in principle that a more rational means of determining regional priorities is necessary.

What is the effect of the change? It is pretty small from the United Kingdom's point of view. Some areas such as the Borders have lost priority and others have gained it, some of which I have mentioned. It is worth noting that the United Kingdom has gained relative to most other member states.

We should not regard the social fund as a great football match in which we try to grab the greatest share that we can. However, it is important to maximise the gain for the United Kingdom. At the same time, it is necessary to consider the underlying purpose of the fund and to ask ourselves whether our targeting is right and whether the existence of the fund encourages us to do things that we might not otherwise have undertaken, especially in the local authority and voluntary sectors.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the unemployment rate in the Borders and the possible effect on the region of its removal from the priority list. It is worth noting that in 1985 there was just one application, which was successful. The application was submitted by a charitable organisation that is directed to the employment rehabilitation of the mentally handicapped. The project is likely to continue to be eligible for social fund assistance despite the change in status of the region. One cannot be absolutely certain but that is the presumption.

The removal of priority status does not exclude the Borders from access to social fund grants. There is scope for applications to be given priority under guidelines that are not subject to regional limitation. Vocational training schemes for new technology skills for those aged under 25 years is one of the target groups. We are as concerned as the hon. Gentleman to ensure that there is as much help for them as possible. We cannot claim that new technology skills are the answer for every young person, but it is important that as many as possible who can benefit from the schemes are able to do so.

The fund is still able to consider training where exceptional measures are being taken to assist industrial restructuring; training-linked jobs in small firms involving certain new technologies; schemes for women, migrant workers or the disabled and innovatory projects. The Department is keen to assist any organisation in the Borders or anywhere else that is contemplating applying to the social fund for assistance. Applications to the Department should be submitted by 31 August. This may mean that some people will not get the holidays that some hon. Members may be expecting.

I turn to the main area in which the hon. Gentlman can help positively, as he is doing, which is to consider whether more can be done perhaps to encourage the establishment of a system that is similar to COSIRA in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman talked about a regional development plan and the creation of appropriate schemes but I cannot provide the answer. In this instance the Department is not the expert and it is not in control. I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are passed to my colleagues in the Scottish Office or even the Department of Trade and Industry. I am sure that he will persist in trying to ensure that with or without public funding there will be the same kind of encouragement, the accumulation of expertise and the finding of means to build and reinforce people's confidence and competence.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the migration of active families and made some mention of dual income households. It is worth noting that I am one part of a dual income household. The hon. Gentleman made a polite remark about my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), which she put in her local newspaper. Unfortunately, his name was misprinted—he was given a female christian name. One of the newspaper's readers wrote asking whether she did not know that the hon. Gentleman was a man. The newspaper printed the letter and it was a week later when it bothered to acknowledge that it was responsible for getting his name wrong.

Apart from examining schemes that have already been agreed, such as the social fund, and pressing for other schemes to be created that will assist in the development of industry and employment in rural areas, we must recognise what is happening outside the social fund, although these developments may be assisted by it. I hope the hon. Gentleman will encourage those who might be referred to as community signposts to learn about the details of the enterprise allowance scheme. It allows many of those who have been out of work for 13 weeks or more and who can produce £1,000 to set up in business while retaining basic benefit for a year. The scheme has been found to be a good way of getting people to fill gaps in the market and to bring together unused resources—often their skills and labour—to meet unmet needs.

It is worth giving encouragement to the youth training scheme. It is knocked sometimes, but it is recognised by those on it to be of great value. The same is true of developing the community programme.

There is a partnership of opportunity and responsibility. We in the Department are glad to play our part and I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity to explain that fact. I wish his constituents well in finding employment and creating a better future for themselves.

North-Western Regional Health Authority Plan

2 pm

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): I have been hoping for some time that my name would be drawn out of Mr. Speaker's hat so that we could debate this subject and I am pleased that it has happened at last, though I am sorry for my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security who has drawn the short straw of replying to the penultimate debate before the recess.

I hope that, although my hon. Friend has a carefully prepared brief from his civil servants, he will throw away some parts of it. I hope that he will not start by telling me that the NHS in the north-west has done relatively well. I know that, and I spend a lot of time telling people that fact. The growth rate in the north-west is 23 per cent. in real terms and is above the national rate. Those who live in Preston, Salford, Wigan, Blackpool, Burnley, Blackburn, Leigh, Bury, Oldham or Tameside will find new hospitals to prove it.

I also do not need to be told that the resource allocation working party system is very good for the north compared with the south, that an extra £52 million has been devoted to the north-west since 1979 and that RAWP is a good system for diverting resources. I know that, too.

I also hope that not too much of my hon. Friend's speech will be devoted to the fact that south Manchester is relatively well off and has 11 per cent. more than the RAWP average for other places in the area. I know that it is the third best in the north-west after Rochdale and Trafford on a hospitalisation index. I mention those facts to get them out of the way. They are agreed and we do not need to debate them.

Let us turn our attention to the nitty-gritty. The regional health authority plan says that Manchester is too attractive. Therefore, it is planned to reduce the number of patient treatments by 9,000 or 10,000—from about 76,000 in 1984 to about 66,000 in 1993. It follows that, with the removal of patients, there will be a removal of beds and of the staff and resources that go with them. The 9,000 or 10,000 patients are to be treated elsewhere in the north-west and the money will go to those districts. We are talking about a localised problem, but one of some magnitude.

While the loss is taking place, south Manchester, like other districts, is witnessing a growth in patient care, reckoned to be 2 or 3 per cent. However, unlike other districts, we are not getting extra money. Indeed, we are losing money. We shall have to deal with additional local patients by squeezing the service provided to them or by sending even more patients elsewhere. That is the basis of the problem.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment recognised in yesterday's statement on the rate support grant that some authorities have less fat to remove than others, because they are already more efficient. We should apply the same principle to the NHS. Compared with other health authorities, the south Manchester authority is efficient and the fat does not exist.

Over the three years up to 1985-86, south Manchester has increased patient treatments by 11·5 per cent. and increased bed throughput by 13 per cent., at a time when its revenue has fallen by £3 million. It is the only district in the north-west that has managed higher activity on a lower budget.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security claimed in his latest letter to me that south Manchester's efficiency was the result of a massive increase in Government investment. It is true that £5 million capital was spent in the district between 1982 and 1984. However, let us be clear what that means. About £1·25 million of that is going on the cardiac and renal services, which are regional specialties. About £2·8 million is going on the Duchess of York new pediatric unit.

That is being paid for out of the savings—which will accrue by changing from the old service to the new unit—of £600,000 a year. All that the district is obtaining, therefore, is the bridging facility while that money comes in. Meanwhile, to pay for the other on-going expenses at the district level, capital expenses—for example on maintenance—are being severely cut.

The improved cost per patient of the district is due not so much to Government investment, as the Under-Secretary claimed, as to good management and increased efficiency. I emphasise the point about efficiency because the district has the second lowest management costs of the region, at under 3 per cent.

The support costs at the Withington and Christie hospitals are low compared with similar establishments. The staffing at the nursing levels is traditionally lower in the district than in hospitals generally, and the cost per activity in the district is the lowest in the north-west. One might compare, for example, the Royal Marsden with the Christie, two cancer hospitals of international repute. The cost per patient at the Royal Marsden is twice that at the Christie.

To meet the targets and budgets set for the district, the people there have not been idle. We have already closed one geriatric ward, having been told that the region has facilities elsewhere. Let us hope it has. One children's ward is being compressed for a year until the new unit opens. We can live with that. Two chest medicine wards have been closed. Again, the region says that it has scope elsewhere, and we hope it has. The maternity arrangements have been completely reorganised to make savings. Other savings have been made and yet others are projected.

The first of our units has gone out to competitive tender, and that represents a continued search for slimness in an already fit athlete. Nobody denies that those efforts should continue, and they will, but what is currently proposed is, frankly, daft. The Under-Secretary had the cheek in his letter to me to say:

> "We are not, in fact, asking South Manchester Health Authority to reduce its services. We are requiring it to live within its means."

He should not insult my intelligence or that of the people of south Manchester. The regional plan precisely and overtly requires south Manchester to reduce its services, and the budget allocated is based on that premise. Therefore, we can live within the means set by the region only by reducing services.

The district has struggled and has managed, on the whole, to maintain services to the patient. Despite much local propaganda, it is generally true that services to the patient have not been badly affected and are still very good. However, we are storing up severe long-term problems. Some of our facilities are now under great strain and matters such as maintenance will get progressively worse.

However, even what we have accomplished is not enough. The original deficit for the current year was £3 million. By the prodigious efforts that I have described, the authority got it down to £900,000. We now have the pay award which, on our calculations, will add £750,000, so that the deficit will rise to £1·5 million. To achieve that, we are having to look at a 4 per cent. across-the-board cut in services. That will affect the medical as well as the support staff and other facilities. To pretend that this is not a cut in south Manchester is to debase the Government's case. This cut is taking place in a region which is expanding and doing well, but it is certainly a cut and no semantics will overcome that fact.

Is this policy sensible? The Government are undoubtedly right in saying that people on the whole would rather be treated locally so that they no longer need to go into Manchester. However, this takes time. We are not responsible for GP referrals. We cannot be responsible for the speed or the absence of facilities in neighbouring districts. We cannot help it if, as is apparently the case, Christie hospital is bogged down with smear tests referred to it from Merseyside and all over the north-west. The hospital does not have the ability to cope. If these reductions occur, our ability to cope will be diminished. If there is to be a transfer to other parts of the north-west, there must be a link between the transfer and reduction of resources.

There is a grey area between those treatments that are purely local and can be treated in district hospitals elsewhere in the north-west and those that are recognised as regional specialties. The reputation of teaching hospitals, especially these hospitals, continues to act as an attraction. Why not? It is difficult to argue that there is any point in destroying excellence simply because it fits into an administrative pattern.

A new element has entered this confusion. We are told that the reduction in the number of patients in south Manchester will no longer be 9,000 by 1993 but will be only 1,200 because Trafford will no longer have its new general hospital. Instead of losing only 3,500 patients, Trafford will lose 9,000 and the additional patients will come across the border to the Wythenshawe hospital.

By 1993, the reduction in south Manchester will be less than originally imagined. Will there be more money? So far, there has been a resounding silence on that question. Will my hon. Friend the Minister guarantee that revised higher budgets for south Manchester will be rapidly produced between now and 1993 to take account of the fact that the case load will be different? We must have that information as soon as possible.

The facilities which are being closed to meet budgetary requirements will be needed if there are to be additional patients by 1993. Do we really envisage that we will remove facilities, with good teams and people working together, in order to have a downturn in the late 1980s, and that we shall try to reconstruct these facilities in the early 1990s? Does that make any sense? Will my hon. Friend urgently consider the programme with the region and the district between now and 1993 in order to avoid breaking up this year teams which will be needed later?

My hon. Friend the Minister and I are good Tories. One of the aspects of being a good Tory is to be sensitive to the speed of change. They may not think that in the GLC, but it is generally true. No amount of accountants' rhetoric can change that. Even if the region is right—I have doubts about some of its policies—there is no way in which this change can take place at this speed. The change will be too quick and unmanageable.

The co-operation which was supposed to occur between the region and the district has not taken place. The regional chairman, Sir John Page, has clearly said that, if he had more money, he would not give it to the south Manchester district. There are 19 districts and, if 18 benefit and one loses, it is no good taking the matter to a vote. But the Minister has ultimate responsibility for it, which he cannot overcome.

I remind my hon. Friend that in 1983 the Government gave a special grant to Tadworth Court hospital over and above its regional allocation direct from the Department. It then gave £890,000 for each of three years. Far be it from me to suggest that that occurred because it was in the south of England and because there was intense media interest in the matter. I am sure that nothing of that kind occurred to influence the decision. But I will not even ask for the £1·5 million that we are short of; I will settle for the same as Tadworth Court. Will the Minister give us £890,000 or some other suitable sum which will help us through the transitional period?

I am very serious about these matters and I should be more than grateful if the Minister would put away his Civil Service brief and look at the problem seriously for himself, remembering my three questions. I am sure that he desires, as I do, not to tarnish a very good record in the National Health Service, and particularly in the north-west. But we cannot make that stick if we allow the region to inflict severe and unnecessary damage on one of the finest centres of medical skill, care and research in the country.

2.16 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): Despite the kind words of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) at the outset about my having drawn the short straw in being here at this time, I am glad that he has had the opportunity, thanks to his luck in Mr. Speaker's draw—or whatever other mechanism is used for deciding when the debates take place—to bring this subject before the House this afternoon. It enables me to pay a well-deserved tribute to the assiduity with which my hon. Friend advances the cause of his constituents and brings the arguments before the House and before Ministers. It also gives me an opportunity to make some comment on the points that he raised.

My hon. Friend will realise that, in pre-empting some of the points that he expected me to make, I shall not be entirely diverted from some observations about what I take to be the record of the present Administration in providing resources for the Health Service in the north-west, but I shall also try to make some response to my hon. Friend's specific questions.

I do not need to tell my hon. Friend that resources in this area are undoubtedly not limitless, any more than are resources in any of the other fields with which Ministers are concerned in this or other Departments, but often the demands can be limitless. Clearly, there is a very large demand for health services, particularly when we take account of the increased number of things that can be done with modern techniques and modern knowledge. One of the main reasons for some of the pressures that we face is the very success of modern medicine, with the much wider range and scope of treatment that it can offer.

It is remarkable that south Manchester, like many other districts throughout the country, is treating many patients today who a few years ago would have had no hope whatever of being treated. That is part of the background to our debate. Even allowing for my hon. Friend's comments, that record has been assisted by a very considerable investment in the south Manchester district. Health Service resources will always—it is probably in the nature of things—be catching up with medical advance, but there has been a considerable investment and it has played a part in the achievements to which he referred and which I want to emphasise.

Equally, I accept that our job as Ministers in the DHSS is to look at all the demands, taking account of and making a judgment about priorities. We have to make as fair and just decisions as we can among the many competing claims. More specifically, we have the responsibility—I refer particularly to the Minister for Health and the Under-Secretary of State dealing with health matters—of dividing the money available to the Health Service between the 14 regional health authorities in England. My hon. Friend will understand how sorry my right hon. and learned Friend and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary are that they were unable to be here this afternoon.

It is the job of the regional health authorities to divide their share among the district health authorities that manage local health services. That allocation of resources to districts must be taken at regional level because at that level are the people who have some genuine understanding of regional and local needs—the people close to the coal face, to use a fashionable metaphor. It is the job of districts to spend prudently the money that they are allocated, as a result of their judgment of what is needed, and not as a result of a decision imposed by Ministers from the centre.

Whatever adjustments one might make to the balance of that decision-making process, it is clear that it would be wrong and unacceptable for south Manchester, or anywhere else, if Ministers attempted to second-guess every decision made at regional or local level.

We are well aware that historically the north-western region has been a deprived area and needs our special attention. My hon. Friend fairly acknowledged that the Government have made great strides towards reducing the inequalities that have existed since the NHS began. Our plans are largely to complete a redistribution of health resources among the relatively well off and relatively poor areas within the next 10 years. The total additional revenue allocation for the north-west this year is £43 million—5·5 per cent above the 1984-85 level. As my hon. Friend is aware, the region is moving quickly towards its revenue target within that framework and will be only 1·8 per cent. below it this year. That should be compared with the fact that it was nearly 11 per cent. below its target in 1977-78 under the Labour Government.

I wish to emphasis the fact that the capital allocation in the north-west this year is the second highest in England. The north-western region receives about 11 per cent. of the national cake for new buildings. About £1 billion-worth of new hospital schemes are being planned, designed and built.

[Mr. Tony Newton]

I hope that it will be common ground between my hon. Friend and I that the north-western region is better off now than it was; it is being more fairly treated in relation to other health regions; it is treating more patients and, I understand, receiving fewer complaints about services than ever before.

I recognise that the implications of all that for south Manchester are of interest to my hon. Friend. The district development for teaching has continued rapidly. A number of facts, some of which my hon. Friend has mentioned, should be emphasised. There has been £5 million of capital spending within the district during the past two years. A new day unit for elderly, mentally infirm patients is in operation. My hon. Friend referred to the £1·25 million in revenue that has been spent on cardiac services and kidney dialysis. Those services are of great importance to many people. He also referred to the new paediatric unit at Withington hospital and an acute leukaemia treatment unit at Christie hospital which are due to be started this year at a cost of £3·6 million.

The district is one of the best funded in the region, and it is the highest funded per head of the population of the north-western region's three teaching districts. In the light of what my hon. Friend said, I do not wish to place great emphasis on that, but in south Manchester it is easier to gain hospital treatment quickly than in many other districts in the north-west, such as Bolton and Blackpool.

Looked at from one point of view, the challenge facing the region—it has its difficulties—is to move other districts towards south Manchester's position. That is the task to which the region has been directing its attention in its new strategic plan. I am in difficulty this afternoon because that new plan was submitted to the Department only recently, and clearly neither officials nor Ministers have had the opportunity that they would wish to consider it.

I am inhibited from giving clear-cut answers to my hon. Friend. It is too early to give a considered reaction to a plan that has only just been received. Against the background of the regional priority, it is clear that south Manchester will continue to develop. This year alone, 50 more open-heart operations are planned at Wythenshawe hospital, making 900 in all, and 41 more renal dialysis treatments are planned at Withington, making 268 in all. That is the sort of development of which we can all be proud, especially those living in south Manchester.

To come closer to the heart of what my hon. Friend was saying, there is the problem that some of that progress could be endangered if the district continues to overspend its cash limits. I understand that £2·8 million is likely to be overspent this year. Unless that is checked, that is money pre-empted from the development in south Manchester and other districts. Under any Government, not just this Government, health authorities must live within their budgets. The regional health authority is therefore working with the district to find ways to reduce the accumulated overspend while continuing to provide the current excellent level of service. They are trying to bring spending under control in ways that go beyond the present arguments and genuinely wish to lay the foundations for future developments in south Manchester. It is important that that should be achieved because, unless it is, it could put in jeopardy the progress that has been made to make south Manchester the centre of life-saving surgery, which undoubtedly it is.

The district authority has set a budget for 1985-86 that can be contained within its cash limits by making better use of its facilities and cutting out waste. In all of that, the proposals are being carefully monitored by the region to minimise the impact on patient care. As far as possible, the region and district hope to reduce the deficit.

Some of the proposed changes may have an effect on the number of beds in certain specialties. For example, a reduction in the number of chest medicine beds might mean that chest medicine would have to be absorbed by neighbouring districts. But, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, if people can receive the care they need closer to their homes, that is an advantage rather than a disadvantage.

I want to pick up the specific questions raised by my hon. Friend. He referred first to guaranteeing revised higher budgets to take account of changes occurring in the plans in other parts of the north-west. He mentioned preserving teams for facilities that might be needed to meet the outcome of the first question. He raised a point about being sensitive to the speed of change. I thought that he was chancing his arm with his parallel with Tadworth, but I understand the spirit in which he put that forward.

I acknowledge my hon. Friend's questions and their importance. He will not expect me to respond specifically this afternoon against the background that the Government are considering the region's strategic plan that underlies his questions. However, I undertake to ensure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will carefully consider his questions; I will ensure that they are brought to their attention. I have no doubt that they will have those questions in mind when considering the region's plan, as they have a duty to do, and when reaching conclusions upon it.

I thank my hon. Friend for ensuring that these concerns are fully and properly brought to the attention of Ministers. I appreciate the spirit in which he has done that. In spite of the fact that there is a large task for us all in this matter, I see no reason to believe that south Manchester, together with the region—and I hope with the help of Ministers—will not succeed in dealing with the difficulties to which my hon. Friend adverted. There will be good cause for the local community and everyone concerned in the north-west, and south Manchester in particular, to be grateful to them for doing so and to my hon. Friend for his efforts to ensure that these considerations are properly taken into account.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That in respect of the Weights and Measures Bill [Lords], notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Greater London Enterprise Board

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It seems most appropriate that the last debate before the House finishes for the summer recess should arise from the subject which has so dominated our proceedings in the current Session. I refer, of course, to the abolition of the Greater London council which concerns a piece of legislation more misconceived and despicable than any other to pass through Parliament in recent years. It also seems most appropriate that answering the debate will be the familiar ministerial figure of the political odd-job man from Marsham street. If work-rate alone is any guarantee of political success, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is well on course to take over from the Secretary of State, now seemingly reconciled to his own abolition in the much-awaited Cabinet reshuffle.

The implications of the GLC abolition, despite what Conservative Members may wish to think, will keep coming back to the House right up to the next general election, because we in the Opposition will not allow Ministers to escape the consequences of their politically motivated butchery of a great council and the democratic rights of Londoners.

The Greater London Enterprise Board is an industrial development and job creation agency set up by the GLC. I should like to pay tribute to Michael Ward, the chairman of the GLC's industry and employment committee, who devised the structure, and to the chief executive and staff who run the board. There have been difficulties, and one understands that immediately, but GLEB was succeeding in its efforts to bring the prospect of work to some of London's 500,000 unemployed, who are on the dole without any hope of a job because of the Government's economically illiterate policies and their wilful refusal to understand the appalling social consequences of such policies.

GLEB exemplifies in practice what an alternative economic strategy should look like, and it is perhaps because dogmatic Ministers cannot tolerate the notion that there are constructive and viable alternatives to hand for the British people that they have done just about everthing that they can to try to undermine the stability of GLEB's operations. It is bad enough that the Government should be denying Londoners the right to elect their own government for the capital city, without at the same time trying to destroy one of the most exciting and widely appreciated initiatives taken by local government in job creation and economic development policy.

I should like to spell out the immediate situation facing the GLC and the enterprise board as a result of the tactics adopted by the Secretary of State for the Environment and his Ministers. During the first two years of the enterprise board's existence the Greater London council provided a total annual budget of around £30 million, made up of some £20 million section 137 funds and £10 million section 3 mortgage loan facilities. The section 137 fund essentially provided the enterprise board with the investment capital that it needed to preserve jobs and help restructure industry in the interests of the community. During that period the enterprise board has invested in some 200 projects, including more than 100 enterprises, creating and preserving between 3,000 and 3,500 jobs.

A recent report by the independent accountants Thornton Baker has confirmed that GLEB has been preserving and creating jobs in London at an average cost of around £4,000 per job. That is significantly less than the amount it costs the nation to keep one male adult unemployed for a year, not to mention the fabulous cost of job creation in the Government's own enterprise zones. Quite apart from direct investment in enterprises, the Greater London Enterprise Board has also implemented a path-breaking strategy in harnessing new technology to the production of goods and services needed in the community to provide long-term viable jobs, and is also implementing enlightened social policies, including encouragement for industrial democracy and greater equal opportunities at work.

The establishment by GLEB of five technology networks, which can harness the creative ingenuity of London's academic sector for the creation of new products and services for industry, has received widespread national and international praise. About one third of all GLEB's investments are in new forms of social ownership, notably in worker co-operatives, whose commercial survival rate is significantly better than the average for new private business start-ups.

It is accepted that neither the Greater London council nor GLEB can solve London's economic problems, since that will take the Socialist policies of the impending Labour Government. But GLEB offers one way that it might be achieved and, since imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, I am proud to say that regional and local authorities in West Germany, New Zealand and Australia are actively examining the establishment of GLEB-type bodies.

For the current year, the Greater London council made a commitment comparable to the two previous years in allocating GLEB a budget of just under £20 million. However, under the paving legislation in anticipation of the abolition of the GLC, the Department of the Environment was given powers to veto expenditure under section 137. From the very beginning of the current financial year the Government have consistently refused to release the full amount approved by the Greater London council for the enterprise board's budget. I remind the Minister that this is not Government money. It is not money put up by his Department. It is money made available by the Greater London council out of the rates raised in Greater London.

Ministers have put objections and obstacles in the way of the enterprise board throughout the whole of this sorry period. First, they said that they wanted to see a system of accountability instituted with the London boroughs. GLEB is quite prepared and ready to do this. Indeed, it is already doing it now in conjunction with the Greater London council.

So the Government adopted another tactic. They started to drip-feed GLEB by allowing the GLC to put a little of its own money into GLEB. But such an unhelpful policy inevitably will lead to a loss of confidence by financial and commercial institutions in the future of the enterprise board and its supported companies.

Matters became even more difficult when the Secretary of State made it clear that a condition for drip-feeding was that the board called a complete halt to any new investment work. As a result of that decision, some 20 major projects involving a potential of about 1,000 jobs which could have provided some hope for London's unemployed have had to be abandoned by the enterprise board as a result entirely of the Government's malicious attitude and obstructive tactics towards the functioning of GLEB.

Still more serious were the indications of increasing nervousness by the banks which have been helping to finance these enterprises, as they perceive the refusal by the Government to release GLEB's entitled funding as a clear signal to withdraw their support from a number of GLEB companies. The Government are responsible for that, and the Minister should hang his head in shame. It has only been the dedication and expertise of the professional staff of the enterprise board which has prevented a series of GLEB companies from being destabilised this summer as a result of the Government's mixture of malevolence and ignorance in the way that they have handled GLEB affairs.

The Minister for Local Government has now told the GLC and the enterprise board that unless a scheme is put to him by the end of this month—Wednesday of next week—he will not even be willing to consider the release of the remaining £10 million of funds due to the enterprise board from the GLC. I underline yet again that this is not money coming from the Minister's parsimonious Department, starving local authorities of cash. It is money coming from the rates already raised and provided by the GLC.

It is well known that a large number of Labour and Tory boroughs want to continue to support GLEB. But the financial uncertainty surrounding the abolition of the GLC, together with rate capping and all the other penalties and controls which the Government now impose on local government, makes it difficult for the boroughs to commit themselves irrevocably. True to form, the Department of the Environment has said nothing about what Ministers consider to be an acceptable level of borough support. The boroughs are told to provide guarantees, but they are never told what guarantees would be acceptable to the Department. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will elaborate on this matter.

In "Streamlining the Cities" the Government said that they wanted to transfer responsibility for industry and employment from the Greater London council to the London boroughs. During the proceedings in Committee on the Local Government Bill we said that such a proposal was economic nonsense. We remain of that opinion. London desperately needs a regional strategic authority which is able to make plans for jobs and industry in the few difficult years that lie ahead for this Conservative Government. I do not wish to insult the London boroughs, but they do not have the resources and the expertise to deal with these matters.

At least in the early stages of the debate Ministers recognised that in order to take on the additional responsibilities for industry and employment which the Government are to push on to the boroughs they would need increased resources. We were told that the present section 137 2p rate might be doubled to a 4p rate for London as a whole. When the Greater London council is abolished, London will lose the product of a 2p rate. However, no sooner was the ink dry on the White Paper than the Government abandoned their promise to increase the resources made available to the boroughs for industry and employment purposes. They gave that promise in order to get out of a difficult corner, but they have reneged on their hint that they might provide additional resources.

The boroughs and the Greater London Enterprise Board are therefore in the position that even if the great majority of London boroughs agree to support GLEB they will be unable, with their present resources, to do so. They will be unable to raise the funding to the level that is necessary to maintain, even at an acceptable minimum standard, the board's investment programme. The Government should provide most of the resources for this programme.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will be able to tell us whether the Government intend to honour their promise to raise the section 137 limit. If the Government are not prepared to raise it, I hope that he will be able to identify other resources which the Government will make available to the boroughs. I hope that at least the Government will be able to pledge an amount that is equal to the amount raised by the boroughs. Without such a commitment there will be a serious question mark over GLEB's ability during the next few years to maintain its investment and its operations.

The Government do not directly criticise the Greater London Enterprise Board, but they carry out cynical and careful manoeuvres to ensure that they will not be held responsible for the financial strangulation of the future operations of the board. However, the Government will not be allowed to escape from their responsibilities. The Government must release the money that is owed to the board. That money has already been provided for it by the ratepayers of the Greater London council.

The Department of the Environment must also accept that it has a responsibility to help the boroughs to find the necessary resources, including those that are provided from the Government's coffers, so that adequate funding of the board can be ensured during the period after the abolition of the GLC and before the next general election. After the next general election the incoming Labour Government will translate the commitment of the Labour party to the board into a major priority in terms of its new economic reconstruction programme. They will pledge significant national resources for the investment and job creation activities of the board.

The jobs of many Londoners are being jeopardised by the irresponsible attitude of Ministers to the Greater London Enterprise Board. That attitude is inspired more by political malice and hatred of the GLC than by concern for the job prospects of Londoners.

2.44 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) in asking for some guarantees from the Government, even at this late stage, on the future of the Greater London Enterprise Board. My hon. Friend's case illustated the problem. The Government are not worried because the GLEB has been a failure; they are worried because it has been a success. Just as they hammered into the ground the GLC's fare's fair policy, which proved to be successful, popular, economical and sensible, so they are hammering into the ground the Greater London Enterprise Board because it has been extremely successful in creating jobs cheaply, in a way that puts to shame the enterprise zones which the Government have promoted and their lack of enterprise in creating jobs in any other area.

As my hon. Friend said, the Government's attitude to the Greater London Enterprise Board or to any success which conflicts with their irrational, Victorian and stupid economic policies is vindictive and malicious. That characterises the Government's attitude to the future of the board when the GLC is abolished.

2.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, it is appropriate that the last debate before the House rises should be on the subject that has dominated the business of both Houses this Session. Of course, it was inevitable that he and I would have to conduct that debate.

There was something symbolic about the hon. Gentleman's solitary stand on this matter today. Until recently he led armies of people round the streets of London, determined to defeat the Government. In Committee he had an army of speech writers, press people and aides at his right hand, and a huge budget available to publicise his case. But now he stands almost alone, apart from the cuddly figure of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). His armed forces have deserted the field. His commander-in-chief is negotiating surrender terms, and I suspect that he had to write the speech that he delivered. The hon. Gentleman resembles the Japanese soldier who emerged from a Pacific island not long ago convinced that the second world war was still in progress.

The hon. Gentleman made a series of remarkable claims about the achievements of the Greater London Enterprise Board. I think he said that it was widely appreciated. I have here a letter from the Consultative Group of Greater London Chambers of Commerce and Trade, which states:

"We are of the opinion that GLEB should be wound up, and that viable assets should be transferred to a new company with an effective management. As a first step we would like to see a completely independent valuation made of the assets of GLEB . . . we do not wish to see major amounts going from ratepayers to continue the expansion of GLEB or to keep in being enterprises that can only be sustained by continuous public funding."

The hon. Gentleman also said that the board was supported by the London boroughs. I have a letter from the clerk of the housing and works committee of the London Boroughs Association, which states:

"We are . . . highly critical of much of the work that has been undertaken by the GLC and some of the London boroughs in this area of economic development . . . In spite of the large budget GLEB have only created a relatively small number of predominantly short-term jobs, and have done nothing to encourage the removal of restrictive practices, overmanning, and the maintenance of artificially high wages. Unless there were significant change in the composition of the management of GLEB and its policies and activities. I do not see any possibility of our members wishing to be involved with it."

That hardly suggests a body that is widely appreciated.

May I deal with some of the figures mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. We could spend the rest of the day debating the cost of the jobs created by the board, but other councillors at County hall, who share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the economic problems of London, have calculated that the jobs created by the board cost, not the £4,000 that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but between £17,000 and £22,000 each.

The hon. Gentleman's problem is that he is trying to say that the GLEB is a responsible body backing worthwhile commercial enterprises in a businesslike way, but he also says that unless the life support system of County hall is continued after 1 April next year the board will collapse. He must make up his mind. Is the board a viable commercial proposition, or not? If it is, there will be no problem, in his words, of convincing the London boroughs that it is worth pursuing. If, as I suspect, it is not a commercial organisation, but an organisation which has funded many projects which can survive only with continual injections of public money, the London boroughs will have understandable reservations about picking up the commitment which the GLC has undertaken.

The achievements of GLEB were compared by the hon. Gentleman with those of the London Docklands Development Corporation, the London Enterprise Agency and other bodies. However, he did not make those comparisons on a common basis. While GLEB's substantial costs to London ratepayers compare with some of those initiatives, its achievement in terms of creating secure, long-term jobs is relatively insignificant. Despite the strenuous efforts made by the council, the hon. Gentleman and GLEB itself, all that we have is a large amount of hot air, a range of political activities of very dubious benefit to Londoners and precious little in the way of a real contribution to the economic well-being of Londoners.

GLEB is almost friendless, in spite of the hon. Gentlemans' claims. The future of the board is quite properly in the hands of the London boroughs. They have told the GLC that they are unable to express support for the board, that they entertain doubts about the wisdom of its policies and investments, and that they may wish to call for a genuinely independent assessment of the board's activities. They will meet my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government on Monday to enlarge on those views. I am sure that he will want to pay close attention to what they have to say. Some London boroughs have gone quite a long way. They see no merit at all in the board, and no justification for expenditure of ratepayers' money on its activities.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister said that the boroughs had asked for an independent audit. If they get it, and if that audit says that GLEB is worth maintaining, will the Minister make extra resources available to the London boroughs so that they can maintain support for GLEB?

Sir George Young: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has been listening to what I have said. I have made it clear that the decision rests not with the Government but with the London boroughs. It is they who have to decide whether they wish to continue to support GLEB. It is not a decision in which the Government have any specific role to play.

One of the most damning of the representations that we have received about GLEB is from a company that went to GLEB seeking help to expand its activities and create new jobs. Its approach failed, not, apparently, because it did not have a good case for support, but because the company's energies were exhausted by the excessively bureaucratic and detailed procedures of the board's staff. I am also tempted to speculate that the board's reaction was prompted, not out of concern for proper investment appraisal, but because the company did not match the board's irrelevant social and political requirements concerning trade union membership and the like——

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: No, I must make progress.

One of the difficulties that faced that company was that at a crucial point in the negotiations the GLEB official concerned was in Tahiti for three weeks, and at another critical stage he disappeared to America for another three weeks.

Against the background of criticism from the boroughs, the chambers of commerce, the Confederation of British Industry and individual companies which have been in touch with GLEB, hon. Members may consider that the Government have been reasonable to the point of generosity in our response to the GLC's application for consent to its proposed funding of GLEB in the current financial year to the tune of £20 million, in addition to the £30 million to £40 million that had been provided in the previous two years. The locus of my right hon. Friend in relation to GLEB is narrow, and it is totally misleading of the hon. Gentleman to claim that the board's future is prejudiced simply because he has not without question given his approval to the expenditure concerned.

The problems that now face GLEB and the uncertainty about its future are not of the Government's creation. It is clear from what I have said that those difficulties arise out of the way in which the board has pursued its activities on both the political and investment fronts. Its declared aims include such matters as "creating novel methods of social ownership and control" and

"pursuing radical methods of worker involvement in production.".

The impression that one gets when one looks at GLEB is very much that the objective of investing in economic development is subordinated to such political aims to the extent that they are an impediment to what might be achieved. Even when the board's investment policy can be divorced from the overriding conditions about trade union membership and so on, it seems that both the property developments and the company investments have, in practice, been made in such a way that they will not be viable without repeated and substantial subsidies from ratepayers. As I have said, GLEB appears to want it both ways. It wants to be a successful commercial company, but it cannot survive without constant injections of public money.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister wants to kill it off.

Sir George Young: The Government are not against local authority involvement in economic development. We recognise that there is a role for local authorities to play, such as the provision of sites and the use of the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978. There is a legitimate role for local authorities to play in providing direct financial assistance to new and expanding companies. However, such activites must be based on a professional and realistic assessment of the market and of local needs. They must be undertaken in partnership with the private sector, which alone can identify the true requirements of industry and commerce and the particular areas where a public sector input can be be of assistance.

GLEB does not meet those tests, and I shall contrast the situation in London with that in the west midlands. It seems that the West Midlands Enterprise Board has concentrated on the job in hand and has attracted the full support of all the district councils in the area, which will take control of the board when the West Midlands county council is abolished. At a cost of £12·5 million to the county council and its ratepayers, the WMEB has created over 4,000 jobs. In these circumstances, I am pleased to announce that my right hon. Friend has today given his consent to a final contribution by the West Midlands county council of £3·5 million, which it seems will be sufficient to ensure the board's long-term future. Hereafter, it will continue with the help of the private sector and self-generating income. The WMEB has the green light, but for GLEB the light is still at orange. The WMEB has received all-party support, whereas GLEB has created difficulties for itself politically and with the investment fraternity. It is not an encouraging prospectus for the London boroughs, which might otherwise wish to fund GLEB.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the 2p rate for spending under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972. He knows that the GLC has to use section 137 in circumstances where the boroughs do not have to because the boroughs have social service powers which they can use without resorting to section 137. The GLC and the metropolitan counties are not in that position. My right hon. Friend has said that he was willing to consider representations on this front. However, we are not yet convinced that there will be a real problem in any particular area, especially when some of the authorities which complain the loudest are spending large amounts of section 137 money on political propaganda.

The Government believe that to be responsive to local needs and conditions in London and in the metropolitan counties it is right for the boroughs and districts to assume, if they so wish, responsibility for the economic development activities of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. They have all the powers that they need to carry out such activities, and many of them already play an active role in this area. After abolition they will have the full rateable resources of their areas to devote to initiatives which their electorates consider to be necessary. Some of them may wish to join together in such initiatives, and they will be entirely free to do so.

The future of GLEB is therefore for the London boroughs to decide. The GLC reluctantly conceded as much only after my right hon. Friend said that he could not agree to the release of all the expenditure proposed by the council in the current year without satisfactory assurances as to GLEB's continuing accountability to London ratepayers for the large sums which it has received. As an independent company, the board is not affected by the abolition legislation. Only the rights of the GLC in relation to the board which remain in existence at 31 March 1986 will pass to successor authorities. We want to know what rights the GLC proposes to hand over to its successors.

In the meantime, we have gone out of our way to allow the board to continue in operation and to protect its previous company investments, however imprudent some of them might have been, while the GLC belatedly opened negotiations with the boroughs about the future. Consent has been given to the entire staffing costs of the board for the first half year and to certain repeat investments. Indeed, we have gone further than that and the board now has sufficient funds to discharge all its contractual liabilities throughout the year, and a separate consent has been promised to secure the future of the five technology networks until next July.

The fact that the board's horizons may have been foreshortened is due entirely to the GLC and the policies that it has adopted. It is for that reason that there is uncertainty about the board's future.

Mine is the last speech before the House rises for the summer recess, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will shortly be putting the milk bottles out in Parliament square, cancelling the newspapers and locking the door. The occupants of the Chair and the staff of the House have had a difficult time during the summer Session and I am sure that their humour and patience have been tested to the full. I hope that I end on a note of unanimity by saying that the entire House wishes the occupants of the Chair and the staff a long and happy summer recess.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I am grateful to the Minister. His good wishes are reciprocated, of course, especially to hard-working Ministers who reply to so many Adjournment debates.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock till Monday 21 October, pursuant to the resolution of the House of 24 July.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 15 July 1985.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Official Opposition

Mr. Cartwright asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will set out (a) the number of employees, (b) the machinery and equipment and (c) other benefits in kind provided to the Official Opposition from public funds in addition to the assistance to opposition parties, indicating the estimated annual value in each case.

Mr. Biffen: In addition to assistance provided to Opposition parties as Short money, assistance from public funds for the Official Opposition is provided in the sum of £66,559 for four office staff; £1,747 for office machinery; and £53,970 for other benefits in kind which include postal services, telecommunications and travel.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will indicate the average time taken by his Office to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Photocopiers

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will list those offices of opposition parties in the House in which photocopying equipment is provided at public expense other than through the funds allocated by the House to opposition parties.

Mr. Biffen: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 9 July at column 424 to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

ENVIRONMENT

Sports Grounds (Safety)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Minister with responsibility for sport will discuss the safety of sports grounds and how future measures might be financed with members of the British Greyhound Racing Board.

Mr. Macfarlane: My working group considering the financing of safety improvements at sports grounds is concerned only with new and existing designations by the Home Secretary under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act. I will consider the need for specific discussions with the British Greyhound Racing Board.

Local Government Ombudsman

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many complaints there have been to the local government ombudsman in each year since the post was established; how many of them referred to cases arising in the city of Liverpool; and whether the complaints can be categorised as to their nature.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The hon. Member should seek this information from the Commission for Local Administration in England.

Social Security Review

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the proposals in the Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security." on (a) central Government payments to local authorities for housing benefit and (b) cuts in the payment for free school meals will be taken into account when setting the rate support grant.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Vehicle Exhaust Emissions

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a full text of the European Economic Community requirements on vehicle exhaust emissions.

Mr. Waldegrave: The most recent full text of the Commission's proposals was published on 19 June (COM(85)288 Final). This is subject to further discussion on a number of points. The standards for vehicle emissions on which an agreement was reached at the Environment Council of 27-28 June are set out in my answer of 3 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) at column 395.

Nature Conservancy Council (Minister's Speech)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of his speech at Peterborough on the opening of the new headquarters of the Nature Conservancy Council on Friday 5 July.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have arranged for copies of my right hon. Friend's speech to be placed in the Library of the House.

Willenhall (Deputation)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if a Minister in his Department will receive a deputation of tenants on Thursday 18 July from the Rosehill estate, Willenhall, Walsall, accompanied by the hon. Member for Walsall, North, to discuss funding for the modernisation by the local authority of its pre-war dwellings.

Sir George Young: Because of prior engagements neither I nor my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will be available to receive a deputation of tenants from the Rosehill estate on that day.

As has been explained previously, the responsibility for deciding whether priority should be given to modernising these properties rests with the local authority. It is not a matter in which Ministers can intervene.

If, however, a deputation of tenants still wish to visit the Department's offices on 18 July, I shall see to it that my officials will be available to receive them and to listen to any points the tenants may wish to make.

Conservation

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy towards the protection of sites of special scientific interest; and under what circumstances or conditions the Government will authorise the development of sites of special scientific interest which meet the criteria for listing or protection under the Ramsar convention, Berne convention or directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government considers that sites of special scientific interest constitute an important part of the national heritage and wish to ensure that as far as possible such sites are protected from damage or destruction and their scientific features conserved.

United Kingdom obligations in relation to sites which meet the criteria for listing or protection under the Ramsar convention, the Berne convention and the EC Birds Directive are met by the site protection measures contained in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. In considering proposals for development, the Government ensure that the conservation and wild life interests of the sites are fully explored and are given every consideration alongside other national interests such as economic, social or defence needs. Where after the fullest consideration it is concluded that there are overriding reasons why that development should be permitted, every endeavour is made to ensure that it proceeds in such a way as to minimise the effects on the nature conservation interest of the site concerned.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Information in the form requested could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However, samples taken from records of correspondence dealt with during the period July 1984 to June 1985 indicate that the average time taken to reply to hon. Members' correspondence is approximately 3½ weeks.

Housing (Expenditure)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the percentage reduction in real terms on public expenditure on housing since 1979.

Mr. Gow: Figures for net public expenditure on housing are given in table 2·6 of the White Paper on the Government's expenditure plans (Cmnd. 9428). But these take no account of the extent to which capital receipts have been available to increase investment. Gross capital expenditure by local authorities, new towns and the Housing Corporation fell by 19 per cent. in real terms between 1979-80 and 1984-85, compared with a reduction of 46 per cent. in the period from 1974-75 to 1978-79.

Discontinuance Orders (Compensation)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has made funds available to local authorities to pay compensation following the making of discontinuance orders in relation to development (a) in national parks, (b) in areas of outstanding natural beauty and (c) elsewhere; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: There is no statutory power for the Secretary of State to contribute specifically to the compensation payable by a local planning authority following the making of a discontinuance order.

Planning Control

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to apply planning control to intensive livestock and horticultural buildings in areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Mr. Macfarlane: The erection of farm buildings is within the limits specified in class VI of the General Development Order "permitted development" under that class. I have published proposals to remove class VI rights from new livestock buildings near housing, so that planning applications would be required; and proposals to qualify class VI rights in respect of farm and forestry roads and buildings in the national parks.

Water Supplies (Quality)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those water supplies which do not meet any of the requirements of the EEC directive on water quality, effective from 15 July showing in each case how many people are affected and for what reason —that is, nitrates, aluminium or lead.

Mr. Macfarlane: I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

North Pennines (Local Inquiry)

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is able to announce the detailed arrangements for the local inquiry into the order designating the North Pennines as an area of outstanding natural beauty.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. The local inquiry will open at 10.30 am on Tuesday 8 October in the council chamber, county hall, Durham. The inspector appointed to hold the inquiry is Sir Stephen Berthon, KCB, and he will be assisted by Mr. G. A. Goulty, who will act as assessor on questions of landscape merit. We will ensure that the arrangements are fully publicised.

Government Contracts

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to allow local authorities to tender for contracts offered by Government Departments for such items as highway maintenance and buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985]: No. The Government have no intention of introducing legislation which will reduce the opportunities available to the private sector.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Alvey Programme

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how much Government money has been committed to the Alvey project aimed at developing technologies for fifth generation computers; how much has been spent; what progress has been made with the project; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many research applications have been approved by the Alvey directorate; and what is their total cost;

(3) how many of the research applications approved by the Alvey directorate have been waiting for more than (a) three months, (b) six months, (c) a year and (d) 18 months to receive some or all of the financial support which was agreed at the time of the approval; and what proportion of approved funding has so far been allocated.

Mr. Pattie: The Government are providing £200 million towards the Alvey programme of which £133 million has been allocated towards 192 projects technically approved by the Alvey directorate. In total £10 million had been spent by the end of June on these projects.

The work necessary to fulfil the objectives of the programme has been defined, and projects have been identified covering the greater part of that work. In general, progress has been satisfactory but there have been problems over the ability of the Science and Engineering Research Council to finance the academic component of some projects.

The number of research projects technically approved by the Alvey directorate but which have been waiting to receive a full offer of the financial support agreed at the time of the approval are:

a. waiting for more than three months 17.
b. waiting for more than six months 9.
c. waiting for more than one year 3.

A number of these projects and others upon which funding has been approved and offered still await the completion of collaboration agreements between the collaborating parties which is also a condition on the availability of funds.

Engineering Companies (Rhyl)

Mr. Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants are available to engineering companies located in Rhyl, north Wales.

Mr. Trippier: Firms in Rhyl, including those in the engineering sector, are eligible to apply for grants under the regional and national schemes of assistance operated by the Department of Trade and Industry, and described in the guide "Support for Business". A copy of the guide is available in the Library.

Vehicle Exhaust Emission

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied that the European Economic Community requirements on vehicle exhaust emissions have now reached a satisfactory resolution on a number of outstanding technical points as mentioned in his reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield on 3 July, Official Report, column 318; if he will list those technical points; and how each of them has been resolved.

Mr. Butcher: There have, since my right hon. Friend's answer, been a number of discussions in Brussels on these points and negotiations are proceeding, but there is still much work to be done before they are satisfactorily resolved. It would not facilitate these negotiations to detail the points under discussion; however the United Kingdom has made clear that they must be resolved before the directive can be adopted.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many representations he has received from the British motor industry on the subject of the European Economic Community's requirements on vehicle exhaust emissions.

Mr. Butcher: Vehicle emissions proposals have been the subject of extensive Ministerial and official correspondence and discussion with interested trade associations and companies over many months.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated cost to the consumer of full implementation of the European Economic Community requirement on car exhaust emission of (i) a 1·6 litre car and (ii) a 2·5 litre car, including purchase price and running cost.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is his estimate of the cost to the British motor industry in implementing the European Economic Community's requirements on vehicle exhaust emissions;

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect on the viability of the British car industry of the latest proposed European Economic Community rules on exhaust emissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The technology required has been developed or is being actively developed by British vehicle and component manufacturers. The costs will depend, amongst other factors, on decisions still to be made by governments of some Member States about whether and when to implement the tighter standards to be permitted; on the commercial responses of the companies affected; and to some extent on outstanding points still under negotiation.

New Businesses

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has available regarding the number of per capita start ups for new businesses in both the last five and 10 years, respectively, from member countries in the European Economic Community; and if he will express the comparison in tabular form.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is not readily available in respect of other members of the European Community. For the United Kingdom the figures available, which are based upon VAT returns, show that between 1980 and 1984 approximately 820,000 new businesses started up.

Hall Russell Shipyard, Aberdeen

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the final date on which he will accept offers to buy the Hall Russell shipyard, Aberdeen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: No date has been set. British Shipbuilders was asked to dispose of all its warshipbuilding yards by 31 March 1986. It remains the Government's intention to privatise Hall Russell.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 month period to the latest available date.

Mr. Tebbit: The full information which the hon. Gentleman requests is not available other than at disproportionate cost.

For the latest month for which full figures are available, however, letters addressed to the Secretary of State by hon. and right hon. Members, to which the Secretary of State replied personally, were replied to on average two weeks and two days from the date of the original letter.

European Community (Internal Market)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the advantages which would accrue to the United Kingdom if the proposals for completing the internal market submitted by Lord Cockfield were adopted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Government have broadly welcomed the Commission's White Paper on completing the internal market and will work for quick adoption of those measures identified as priorities by the Milan European Council. This is a massive task but a genuine single market in goods and services is of vital importance in safeguarding our long term prosperity and in providing the basis of greater competitiveness with the USA and Japan.

INMOS Plant, Newport

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he or any of his officials have had a meeting with the management of the INMOS plant at Newport about future employment prospects there.

Mr. Butcher: No. Employment prospects at Newport are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. However, officials from this Department's electronics applications division have always maintained regular contact with the company, and continue to do so.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Duty Solicitor Scheme

Mr. Corbett asked the Attorney-General whether he is satisfied with progress on the establishment and costing of the proposed duty solicitor scheme; and whether he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Government are considering urgently proposals from the Law Society, which is responsible for setting up the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme.

Mr. Corbett asked the Attorney-General whether the proposed duty solicitor scheme will include a nationwide telephone scheme to enable people held in police custody to contact friends or relatives to secure the services of a solicitor.

The Attorney-General: Decisions on this will be taken shortly.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Attorney-General if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department and the Lord Chancellor's Department, respectively, to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

The Attorney-General: Neither my Department nor the Lord Chancellor's Department is able to provide the information requested save at disproportionate cost. However, the tables following show the average time taken to send a substantive reply to letters received from hon. and right hon. Members during February and March 1985.

Number of letters received		Average time to reply
Lord Chancellor's Department	296	17 working days

PRIME MINISTER

Falkland Islands (Soviet Submarines)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what knowledge is available to Her Majesty's Government about the presence of a Soviet submarine in the vicinity of the Falkland Islands maritime exclusion zone on or about 1 May 1982.

The Prime Minister: It is not our practice to comment on submarine operations.

Falkland Islands (Ecology)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report, the letter of 2 July from the Falkland Islands Foundation on Ecology in the South Atlantic and her reply.

The Prime Minister: It is not my practice to publish private correspondence that has been sent to me.

WALES

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of (a) 16 to 18-year-olds and (b) 16 to 26-year-olds in Wales (i) are currently unemployed and (ii) have been jobless for one year or more.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The available information relates to 16 to 18-year-olds and 16 to 24-year-olds and is based on 1984 population estimates. As at April 1985 it is estimated that 14 per cent. of 16 to 18-year-olds and 17·1 per cent. of 16 to 24-year-olds were unemployed in Wales. At the same date the proportion of 16 to 18-year-olds unemployed for over one year was estimated at 2·1 per cent. and that of 16 to 24-year-olds 5·3 per cent.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales have been unemployed for a) one year or more, (b) two years or more and (c) three years or more.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The duration analysis of unemployed claimants is available on the House of Commons computer. In April 1985, 75,573 claimants had been unemployed for over one year, 45,288 for over two years and 28,431 for over three years.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the number of jobless (a) 16 to 17-year-olds, (b) 18-year-olds and under, (c) 21-year-olds and under and (d) 26-year-olds and under in Wales at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The age analysis of unemployed claimants does not provide data entirely on the basis requested. The available information for April 1985 is as follows:

Cumulative total of claimants unemployed

Age group	Numbers
16 and 17-year-olds	8,446
18-year-olds and under	18,969
19-year-olds and under	30,040
24-year-olds and under	70,312

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Letters received from right hon. and hon. Members between 1 June 1984 and 31 May 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, received substantive replies within an average time of 17 days.

EMPLOYMENT

Work Permits

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state, for each day between 25 December 1984 and 10 January 1985, the number of applications for work permits under the special provisions for a limited number of places for unskilled and semi-skilled workers from the United Kingdom's dependent territories.

Mr. Alan Clark: The number of applications between 1 and 10 January 1985 which fell for consideration under these special provisions is listed below. Because we considered only applications made in 1985, no record was kept of applications made between 25 and 31 December 1984.

Number of applications made

Date	Number
1 January 1985	85
2 January 1985	50
3 January 1985	18
4 January 1985	10
5 January 1985	2
6 January 1985	2
7 January 1985	6
8 January 1985	10
9 January 1985	12
10 January 1985	10

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will indicate the date of application for each work permit granted under the provisions for a limited number of places for unskilled and semi-skilled workers from the United Kingdom's dependent territories.

Mr. Alan Clark: The date of application for each work permit issued in 1985 under these provisions is as follows:

Number of permits issued

Date	Number
1 January 1985	73
2 January 1985	42
3 January 1985	16
4 January 1985	4
5 January 1985	1
6 January 1985	0
7 January 1985	5
8 January 1985	6

Note: One of the permits issued has since been rescinded. Two applications made on 1 January 1985 and one application made on 8 January 1985 have yet to be decided. To date no permits have been issued for applications made after 8 January 1985.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment why managing agents for the youth training scheme are paid a fee for contracted places which are not filled; and what was the cost of fees paid in these circumstances in 1984.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission pays managing agents a fee for each contracted place on the youth training scheme as a contribution towards their administrative costs in setting up and running a training programme. This fee is paid in advance to assist managing agents to prepare schemes, but they may be required to refund the fee if they fail to offer the number of places specified in the contract. Where, however, places remain unfilled through no fault of the managimg agent, the Manpower Services Commission does not normally require payment.

Information on the cost of fees paid in 1984 for places which remain unfilled is not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have registered as willing to work, giving details of their skill and experience, at jobcentres covering Sudbury and Haverhill at the most recent convenient date; and how many people were registered as unemployed for the purpose of benefit in the equivalent area at the same date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 7 June 1985, 421 jobseekers were registered at the Sudbury jobcentre and 385 jobseekers registered at the Haverhill jobcentre. These figures include some employed people seeking a change of employment and some unemployed people not claiming benefit. The numbers of unemployed persons claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits in the Sudbury and Haverhill jobcentre area on 13 June 1985 were 1,286 and 1,316 respectively. It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide a breakdown of the latest national unemployment figures according to standard under 18, 18 to 24, 24 to 44 and 45 years plus age groupings, by the standard under 26, 26 to 52, 52 to 104, 104 to 156, 156 to 208, 208 to 260 and 260 plus weeks duration of unemployment groupings as a total, and by sex.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information relating to 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, is published in table 2.6 of the Department's Employment Gazette for June. This is available in the Library.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his recent official visit to Liverpool.

Mr. Tom King: During my visit to Liverpool on 12 July, I carried out a series of engagements including meeting trainees on a Royal Insurance youth training scheme and visiting the Liverpool unemployment benefit offices, J. Bibby, Edible Oils' new plant at Brocklebank Dock, Bootle, the Albert Dock development, International Management Consultants Ltd., who are providing two courses under the training for enterprise programme, and also a variety of businesses set up under the enterprise allowance scheme at the new enterprise workshops, Brunswick Dock.

Unions (Political Levy)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received alleging threats by union officials against members in connection with their voting intentions in relation to the political levy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have not received such representations. Under the Trade Union Act 1984, a trade union's political fund ballot rules must provide for every voter to be allowed to vote without interference from, or constraint imposed by, the union or any of its members, officials or employees. My advice to trade union members who experience any such interference or constraint would to raise this at a senior level within their union at the earliest opportunity. Any member in this position has a right of complaint to the courts. Should a court find that the ballot had not been taken in accordance with the rules, the union could be required to stop spending on electoral and party political matters.

EMPLOYMENT

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. However, a sample survey taken for all replies despatched in the month of June shows that the average time taken to reply was 15 working days. If the hon. Member is concerned about a delay on a particular case I would be very willing to look into the matter.

EC (Labour Statistics)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the reply by the Under-Secretary of State on 9 July, what are the main reasons for the reduction in the number of persons employed in the Common Market over the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Jobs were lost in the Community mainly because of a decline in competitiveness, due partly to excessive increases in labour costs and labour market rigidities. Completion of the internal market, moderation in wage rises and the achievement of greater labour market flexibility would lead to growth in the number of jobs.

Job Creation

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many additional jobs were created in special employment schemes and in (a) community programme and (b) youth training in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The numbers covered by the employment and training schemes and the estimated direct effect on unemployment at 31 March in 1983 and 1984 is set out in the following table:

	31 March 1983	31 March 1984
(a) Covered by Community Programme and Community Enterprise Programme	39,000	113,000
(b) Covered by Youth Training Scheme and Youth Opportunities Programme	240,000	285,000
(c) Covered by Other Schemes	378,000	247,000
(d) Total covered	657,000	645,000
(e) Estimated direct effect on unemployment	365,000	455,000

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the additional numbers employed in special employment schemes are included in his estimate for the additional jobs created in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: Participants in the community programme, young worker's scheme job splitting scheme, temporary short-time working compensation scheme, job release scheme, and training for skills, together with those on the youth training scheme who have contracts of employment are included in the estimates of the numbers of employees in employment. Those supported by the enterprise allowance scheme are included in the estimates of self employment.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many additional jobs have been created for (a) employees and (b) the self-employed in 1985 to date; and what proportion are part-time.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the change in the numbers in employment in the first quarter of 1985 will first be available on Wednesday 17 July 1985. In 1984, the number of employees in employment in Great Britain is estimated to have increased by 142,000 and the numbers of self employed by 199,000. There was an increase of 184,000 female employees in part-time jobs in 1984; corresponding figures for part-time males are not available. The latest available figures subdividing self employment between full and part-time work show that nearly 80,000 of the 273,000 increase in self employment between June 1983 and June 1984 was among part-timers.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment, further to his answer of 10 July, how many additional jobs created for employees in 1983 and 1984 he estimates to be second jobs.

Mr. Alan Clark: The second jobs included in the employees in employment estimates are not separately identified. Estimates from labour force surveys suggest an increase of 60,000 between spring 1983 and spring 1984 in the number of people with a second job as an employee; however, such estimates from sample surveys are subject to appreciable uncertainty.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many out of the total number of those still trading six months after completing the enterprise allowance scheme had been unemployed for more than a year at the same time of their entry on to the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: A survey of those completing the enterprise allowance scheme in the pilot areas found that 18 per cent. of those still trading six months after leaving the scheme had been unemployed for more than a year prior to joining the scheme. The results of a later survey of people three to five months after completing a year on the national scheme found that 27 per cent. of the respondents who were still trading had been unemployed for more than a year at the time of their entry to the scheme.

Training Organisations

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment which non-statutory training organisations have board or equivalent level membership for relevant trade union or education representatives; and which are governed solely by employer representatives.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 418]: The composition of non-statutory training organisations is a matter for the particular industrial sector. I am informed by the Manpower Services Commission that the majority of non-statutory training organisations have consultative arrangements with trade unions and that during the last year there has been an increase in the number of trade unions accepting invitations to be members of these organisations' committees and boards.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail which industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations currently operate more than three offices and training centres nationally; and if he will state how many they operate, and the number of industry training board offices and training centres which have closed since 1981, for each industry training board.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 418]: This information is available only for the statutory industrial training boards which were retained in 1982. Training in those sectors of industry covered by non-statutory training arrangements is the responsibility of employers in those sectors and information is not held by the Manpower Services Commission.

The numbers of offices and training centres for 1981 and the present, for the industrial training boards which currently operate, are given in the following table:

	Offices now	Offices in 1981	Training centres now	Training centres in 1981
Clothing and allied products ITB	1	1	—	—
Construction ITB	64	68	6	6

HOME DEPARTMENT

Air Weapons

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his assessment of the outcome of his Department's air weapon safety campaign launched in December 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: An assessment of the campaign cannot be made until the comparative statistics on air weapons offences committed during 1984 become available in the autumn.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables as to how many instances of cats and dogs being injured by air gun pellets were notified to the police during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further consideration the Government have given to the recommendation of the 1973 Green Paper on firearms control to raise the age at which persons may be in possession of air weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have continued to keep the matter under close review and have decided not to introduce legislation to raise the age restrictions at present. We shall consider what, if any, further measures are necessary when the effects of the national publicity campaign conducted in 1983 have been fully assessed.

Citizenship

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of applications at his Department from people seeking British citizenship.

Mr. Waddington: About 35,000.

Victim Support Schemes

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further proposals he has for the funding of local victim support schemes.

Mr. Mellor: We have at present nothing to add on this point to the Government's reply (Cmnd. 9457) to the report of the Home Affairs Committee on Compensation and Support for Victims of Crime (HC 43).

Prison Service (Chaplains)

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of full and part-time chaplains employed in the prison service in England in 1974, 1979, 1983, 1984 and 1985 at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: The number of full and part-time chaplains employed in the prison service in England and Wales on 1 July in each of the following years was:

	1974	1979	1983	1984	1985
Full-time	61	69	84	85	86
Part-time	73	44	49	45	48

In addition each establishment has a Methodist chaplain on a sessional basis, and where the pastoral care of an inmate cannot be provided by the full or part-time clergy, or when an inmate asks to see a minister of another faith, the establishment will seek to provide the services of an appropriate visiting minister.

Vietnamese Refugees

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he is making to the request by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees for the establishment of a fresh quota for settlement in the United Kingdom of Vietnamese refugees currently in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Sir Patrick Wall) on 17 May at column 239.

Police (Training)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the length of training for police officers to familiarise themselves about the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act; what is the estimated cost of such training; and what extra funds have been made available for these training purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government set 1 January 1986 as the target date for the implementation of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act to allow sufficient time for forces to familiarise their officers with its provisions. Six months was identified by the service as the minimum period that would be needed to put all officers through the necessary training programmes, though in many forces preparatory work will have been going on for substantially longer. The length of time which each officer will spend under instruction varies from force to force but is in the region of three to five days.

Training material for use in provincial forces has been produced by the Home Office central planning unit at a cost to central funds estimated as likely to be in the order of £100,000. It is the practice to accommodate training for new legislation into the general cycle of training rather than to make separate financial provision.

Drugs (Rapid Testing Equipment)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the cost, reliability and availability of equipment designed to carry out rapid testing of compounds for possible content of heroin or cocaine; and what is his policy in regard to the provision of such equipment to assist the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Independent Local Radio

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, columns 284-85, what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the Independent Broadcasting Authority's revised proposals for independent local radio in Derby and Nottingham received his approval in time to allow all intending bidders to reformulate their proposals and seek the necessary additional finance before the closing date for bids.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under section 19(4) of the Broadcasting Act 1981, the Independent Broadcasting Authority is required to publish a notice stating its intention to enter into a contract for the provision of local sound broadcasts in an area and the date from which the contract will take effect, and inviting applications for the contract. In each case, the authority aims to provide applicants with approximately three months in which to submit their applications, and I understand that this procedure was followed for the proposed Derby and Nottingham franchise.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Brittan: The information for the past 12 months could not be provided without disproportionate cost. A computer system has, however, been introduced recently which records the arrival of all correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members and monitors progress up to the dispatch of the substantive reply. Statistics for average handling times should therefore be available in due course.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his assessment of the change in the numbers entering the United Kingdom as a result of the amendments to the immigration rules which he is introducing to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Waddington: It is not possible to make an accurate assessment. It is estimated that the change by which husbands and fiances are to be allowed to join women who are permanently resident here but are not British citizens would, taken alone, lead to about 600 more men from the Indian sub-continent being admitted a year for residence and about a further 1,500 from other parts of the world.

The other changes are likely to lead to a reduction in the numbers admitted but I cannot say by how much.

Police Act 1964 (Reports)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) the number of occasions on which he has exercised his powers under section 30 of the Police Act 1964 to require a chief constable or the Commissioner of Police of the city of London to submit a report to him, (b) the number of occasions on which he has exercised his powers under section 12 of the Police Act 1964 to require the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to submit a report to him, (c) the matters that he specified should be covered in such reports, and the police forces concerned and (d) whether any such reports have been published in each of the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Section 30 of the Police Act 1964 is the general power under which the Department obtains information from the police forces on any aspect of police work. Information may be obtained in many ways, formal and informal, and no central record is kept of requests to forces. It is not the practice to publish written reports provided by chief constables in response to such requests. Section 12 of the Police Act does not apply to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

My right hon. and learned Friend requires reports from the commissioner under general powers in section 1 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1829. Under this power he receives and presents to Parliament the commissioner's annual report. In January this year the commissioner published his report to me on his future strategy for the Metropolitan police.

Philip Rapier (Inquest)

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will apply to the courts for a new inquest into the death of Philip Rapier in March at Swansea prison, in the light of new evidence submitted to his Department by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful for the right hon. Member's concern but see no reason to pre-empt the inquiries at present being made.

Opinion Polls

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information on legislation extant in other European Economic Community countries on the banning of opinion polls for periods prior to public elections; if he has any plans to introduce such legislation in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The only information we have is for France, where in 1977 legislation was introduced banning the publication of opinion polls from the week before the first round of any elections. There are no plans to introduce similar controls in the United Kingdom.

Strangeways Prison

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 10 July, if he will take steps (a) to secure the removal from Strangeways prison of the 13 prisoners whom are mentally disordered within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983 and the three inmates who the medical officer considers to be physically handicapped and (b) to arrange for places to be provided for them in other more appropriate accommodation.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the right hon. Member.

Drug Trafficking

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of persons (a) against whom extradition proceedings have been taken or are planned in relation to drug-related offences and (b) are sought by police forces to assist them with inquiries into drug-related matters, who have sought asylum in foreign countries between 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 16]: The available information relates only to persons who have been the subject of formal applications for extradition in respect of drug offences.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. Jim McAlpine

Mr. Dobson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when a fatal accident inquiry into the death of Jim McAlpine, following cosmetic surgery at the Ross Hall hospital, is to be held.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: A fatal accident inquiry into the circumstances of the death of James McAlpine, aged seven years, on 24 February 1985, commenced in Glasgow sheriff court on 17 June 1985. Following four days of evidence, the inquiry was adjourned until 21 October 1985.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Between 1 July 1984 and 30 June 1985 the average time taken to answer 227 letters was 18½ days. A further five letters still await reply.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

RMS St. Helena (Replacement)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the application for a replacement vessel for RMS St. Helena was first made; when a decision will be taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: No application for a replacement for the RMS St. Helena has been made, although we have been aware for some time that the ship is nearing the end of her operational life. Consultants were engaged last year to advise on the options for the future of the shipping service. In the light of their report, I have agreed that detailed proposals should be prepared for a replacement vessel of roughly similar size to the existing ship.

Food Aid

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his most recent assessment of the priority objectives for food aid and its distribution in the drought-affected countries of Sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: Priority in the use of food aid should be given to direct famine relief. We are concentrating our bilateral food aid on those countries in Africa most seriously affected by famine, and have urged the European Community to do the same. It is also vital to get food from the ports to the people who need it and we are playing our part together with other aid donors in providing urgent assistance for this operation.

Tropical Forests

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will provide aid through the Commonwealth Development Corporation and Overseas Development Administration for projects in tropical forest regions which will encourage sustainable forestry.

Mr. Raison: In their different ways the Overseas Development Administration and the Commonwealth Development Corporation support projects for this purpose in more than 20 countries. Both are always ready to consider new proposals to encourage sustainable forestry.

UNESCO

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the extent to which the executive board meeting of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation on 21 June made progress towards the objectives set out in his letter of 4 December 1984 to the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: The executive board reached a series of complicated decisions which we are now analysing as part of our preparation for the general conference. It is clear that there was some progress, particularly towards administrative improvement and towards a more efficient and less politicised programme; but we shall need to keep up the pressure for reform.

West Indies

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received the report commissioned by him from the Highlands and Islands Development Board on involving the private sector in the development of the West Indies; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The consultants' report has just been received and its proposals are now being studied. In my statement at the meeting of the Caribbean Group for Co-operation in Economic Development in Washington on 17 June, I said that we would be ready to consider with individual Governments whether some of our bilateral aid might be used to do more in the private sector.

Organisation of East Caribbean States

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had during his recent visit to the aid conference in Washington about the possibility of a conference in, or visit to, the Organisation of East Caribbean States; and what was the outcome of those discussions.

Mr. Raison: I was approached by the Prime Minister of St. Kitts/Nevis, on behalf of the Organisation of East Caribbean States, to seek a meeting at ministerial level to discuss general policy issues arising from our bilateral aid to the OECS states. I have since offered to meet OECS Ministers for this purpose in the Caribbean. I hope that a meeting can take place soon.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any progress has been made in identifying a site on St. Helena for use as an emergency landing strip.

Mr. Raison: A possible site, on Prosperous Bay plain at the eastern tip of the island, was the subject of an airborne reconnaissance survey by the RAF earlier this year. Civil engineering and cost factors, however, are still expected to present formidable problems. Arrangements are being made for these aspects to be examined on the island.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Broadleaved Woods

Mr. Alton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will name the broadleaved woods in the Forestry Commission's North West England Conservancy which received felling licence approval for conversion to agriculture between 1982-83 and 1984-85.

Mrs. Fenner: The information is as follows:

Surplus Potato Stocks

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial support was provided from public funds to the Potato Marketing Board to enable it to take surplus potato stocks off the market in the year ended 31 May; how much he expects to be provided for the same purpose in the year ending 31 May 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have so far advanced £13·24 million to the Potato Marketing Board towards the cost of its 1984 crop support buying operations and £0·359 million as a final payment in respect of 1982 crop support. A final cost-sharing settlement for the 1984-85 season will be made when information is available about the United Kingdom cumulative average ex-farm price for the whole season, the total cost of support and the level of the board's financial resources. It is not possible to provide an estimate of the cost of market support for the year ending 31 May 1986. This will depend on the size of any surplus to be removed. Joint support arrangements for 1985-86 will be limited to 500,000 tonnes.

New Potatoes

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the volume of new potatoes imported from France in the period May-June 1984; what was the volume of new potatoes imported from France in the period May-June 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: New potato imports from France during May and June 1984 totalled 1,144 tonnes and 14,751 tonnes respectively. Imports in May amounted to 2,590 tonnes. Official statistics from HM Customs and Excise are not yet available for June 1985. However, it seems likely that total imports from France this season will be below traditional levels. It is estimated that new potato imports from all sources will be around 75,000 tonnes less this season than last. Although the market is depressed throughout Europe, it appears that it is a high level of domestic liftings rather than imports that is having the main effect on our market at present.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the additional weekly cost to the food purchases of the average British family in consequence of Britain's involvement in the common agricultural policy; and what would be the effect on the retail prices of beef, butter, bread, sugar and flour if the import levies required by the common agricultural policy were abolished.

Mrs. Fenner: Estimates of the kind requested could only be attempted by making hypothetical assumptions about the policy which would have been pursued had we not been a member of the European Economic Community.

Grain Storage

Mr. Craigen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the cost of each of the five new grain stores agreed with the Intervention Board; and what discussions he has had with the Home-Grown Cereals Authority about the use of unutilised capacity in Clyde port authority's granary.

Mr. MacGregor: The cost of storage is commercially confidential and depends on contractual terms negotiated with individual storekeepers. Storage at the Clyde port authority's granary was offered to the Intervention Board but along with other storage in that area was not accepted because it is not close to grain-growing areas.

International Whaling Conference

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government will support any moves at the international whaling conference next week to postpone from 1990 to 1999 the zero catch limits on killing for commercial purposes.

Mr. MacGregor: Under paragraph 10(e) of the Schedule to the international convention for the regulation of whaling 1947 the zero catch limits for commercial whaling are of indefinite duration. This provision is to be kept under review and by 1990 at the latest the International Whaling Commission is to undertake a comprehensive assessment of its effect on whale stocks and consider modification of this provision and the establishment of other catch limits. We shall carefully consider any proposals in the light of developments.

Potato Marketing Board

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce legislation to abolish the Potato Marketing Board.

Mr. MacGregor: The power to abolish the board is vested in producers because it is a producer organisation constituted under the Agricultural Marketing Act 1958. Producers can decide at any time to call for a poll to revoke the potato marketing scheme. Provisions for the protection of the public interest arising from any act or omission by a marketing board are contained in the 1958 Act. My hon. Friend will recall that proposals for amending the potato marketing scheme and for introducing revised potato support arrangements were considered at length and approved by both Houses in February.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what criteria are used by the Potato Marketing Board to determine (a) the amount of potatoes to be withdrawn from the market in order to support prices and (b) the means by which they should subsequently be disposed of.

Mr. MacGregor: The board can intervene in the market in two ways up to a limit of 500,000 tonnes in any season. Between November and May, the board operates a system of pre-season contracts with producers, this season limited to 420,000 tonnes of potatoes. If the average ex-farm price is at or below the contract price for the month in question the board takes delivery of the potatoes under contract that month and removes them from the human consumption market. If the price is £2 or more above the contract price then producers are released from their contractual obligations and can sell the potatoes for human consumption. In any event producers can opt to be released from their contracts if they have a market at a higher price than the board contract.

In addition to these contract arrangements, the board may intervene directly on the market at any time during the season to buy up local surpluses to a limit of the balance between its contracts and 500,000 tonnes. Intervention is triggered if for three consecutive trading days ex-farm prices in a board district are below the trigger price for the period in question. The trigger prices are set well below the level of pre-season contract prices except in the first two weeks of July when special market circumstances apply. In disposing of any potatoes bought under market support arrangements the board is obliged by the Government to seek the highest value disposal outlets available. Over the course of a season most of the potatoes bought would be re-sold for stockfeed.

CIVIL SERVICE

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will indicate the average time taken by the Management and Personnel Office to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Hayhoe: This information is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. However, the MPO aims to reply to letters from right hon. and hon. Members within 10 working days of receipt and this target is normally achieved.

THE ARTS

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will indicate the average time taken by the Office of Arts and Libraries to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. But the Office of Arts and Libraries aims to despatch a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members within 10 working days of receipt; this target is achieved in most cases.

TRANSPORT

M6

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what repair and renovation works of the road surfaces and supporting structures are currently planned to be carried out, when and at what cost, to junction 6 of the M6.

Mrs. Chalker: A contract for the installation of gutters beneath deck joints on a length of M6 including junction 6 is currently in progress; the total cost is estimated at £350,000. This contract will be followed by one to improve the quality of the joints themselves where they cross verges or central reserve and where gutters are impractical. As these contracts are for more than one viaduct costs are not identifiable to junction 6 alone.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) on what date the latest report on structural damage or defects on junction 6 of the M6 was submitted to his Department; what works are contemplated when and at what cost as a result of any such report; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what recent indications of damage to seams or joints, or other suspected structural defects, have been found on junction 6 of the M6; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I must ask the hon. Member to await the promised interim report on the Midlands links viaducts which I shall shortly be placing in the Library of the House.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason traffic on junction 6 of the M6 was at a standstill at about noon on Monday 8 July; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: A major accident involving three articulated tanker vehicles occurred near Bescott at 11.20 a.m. on that day. The northbound carriageway was completely blocked and the southbound carriageway had to be closed until danger of an explosion had passed. The queue of northbound traffic extended back to junction 6. Diversions were introduced as soon as possible and the carriageways were reopened southbound at 12.15 p.m. and northbound at 5.15 p.m. I commend the police and emergency services for their prompt action and efficiency in these difficult circumstances.

Buses (Annual Inspections)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of private buses failed their annual inspection in 1983 and 1984; and what were the comparable figures for National Bus Company buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information is as follows:

Operator	Number of tests	Initial passes	Per cent.	Additional passes after rectification of minor defects	Per cent.	Fails	Per cent.
1982-83
Private	28,353	14,938	53	4,108	14	9,307	33
NBC	14,843	7,740	52	4,640	31	2,463	17
1983-84
Private	28,634	16,040	56	3,828	13	8,766	31
NBC	14,173	8,509	60	3,973	28	1,691	12

The initial pass/fail rates for private operators' vehicles are similar to those for the NBC. An operator is permitted to carry out on the spot repairs on a vehicle which has failed for minor reasons. The vehicle is then given a "pass after rectification". The "pass after rectification" facility favours the larger operators, many of whose vehicles are tested on their own premises. Operators whose vehicles are not tested at their own premises—notably private operators—are usually unable to take advantage of the facility and this fact is clearly reflected in a higher fail rate for their vehicles as shown in the table.

M5-A30

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in constructing a link to enable southward traffic passing down the M5 to turn left into the A30.

Mrs. Chalker: The case for proceeding with such a link road is being examined by consulting engineers as part of their overall review of possible improvements to the A30 between Honiton and Exeter. The results of a recent traffic survey are being analysed at present and will guide the consulting engineers in the review of possible improvements.

Drink-and-Drive Campaign

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what dates in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 the evaluations were available for the Christmas drink-and-drive campaign in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively.

Mrs. Chalker: Evaluations of the Christmas drink-drive campaigns are formally published in "Road Accidents Great Britain" (RAGB). The dates of publication were as follows:

RAGB 1980—30 November 1981
RAGB 1981—17 December 1982
RAGB 1982—15 November 1983
RAGB 1983—29 November 1984

Dartford Tunnel

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out in the Official Report the number of convoys escorted through the Dartford tunnel on average per week; for how long the tunnel is closed on average to facilitate their passage; what is the impact on M25 traffic flows as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The Dartford tunnel is the responsibility of the Dartford Tunnel Joint Committee. I understand however that in two surveys carried out last year there were about 700 escorted journeys per working week in each direction. Entry to the southbound tunnel is closed by signals for about 40 seconds while a convoy gets underway. There is hardly any delay for northbound traffic. These escorted convoys marginally reduce the capacity in the tunnel and slightly delay traffic on the A282 approach roads but the effects do not extend as far as the M25.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department acquired No. 86 Church Manorway, London S.E.2, in connection with the proposed east London river crossing; how long it has been empty; and when it is expected to be occupied.

Mrs. Chalker: This property was acquired by the Department on 26 April 1985 with vacant possession. It was let on a short term lease to Greenwich borough council as from 17 June 1985. The question of occupancy is therefore a matter for it.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will delay the public inquiry into the proposed east London river crossing to enable it to consider the report of the engineering study on an additional river crossing at Dartford.

Mrs. Chalker: No. The east London river crossing is urgently needed irrespective of the river crossing capacity at Dartford.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the most recent assessment of the volumes of traffic likely to use the east London river crossing (a) with the existing Dartford tunnel capacity and (b) with an additional river crossing in use at Dartford.

Mrs. Chalker: The most recent assessment indicates that, in the year 2001, two-way morning peak flows across the east London river crossing Thames bridge would be between 5,600 and 6,600 vehicles per hour with the existing Dartford tunnel capacity and toll arrangements, and between 5,200 and 6,200 vehicles per hour if an additional tunnel were provided at Dartford and no tolls were charged.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimate of the total cost of the proposed east London river crossing including individual figures for (a) property acquisition, (b) bridge building and (c) road construction.

Mrs. Chalker: A breakdown of the total cost of £168 million in 1984 prices was given in the statement of reasons published on 9 July which was sent to the hon. Member. Taking account of updating and estimates for preparation and supervision, the figures are as follows:

	£ million
The bridge across the Thames	56
Other structures	38·5
Road construction	40·5
Land and property acquisition	19·6
Preparation and supervision	13·4

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Ridley: The precise information required is not held centrally and can only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However, a study of correspondence received in May 1985 shows that 80 per cent. of letters from right hon. or hon. Members have been replied to with an average response time of 15·147 working days. My ministerial colleagues and I aim to deal with all inquiries in three weeks, but some complex questions do inevitably take longer.

Leeds and Liverpool Canal

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department proposes to provide any financial assistance towards the scheme to revitalise the Leeds and Liverpool canal in Lancashire.

Mr. David Mitchell: I will answer this question shortly.

ENERGY

Electricity Generation Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the latest comparative electricity generating cost figures for coal, oil and nuclear powered stations.

Mr. Goodlad: The Central Electricity Generating Board estimates that electricity generating costs are:

2·65p per kWh for Magnox stations;
2·63p per kWh for modern coal stations;
3·25p per kWh for modern oil stations;
2·64p per kWh for the first half of the coal-fired station at Drax;
2·45p per kWh for the AGR station at Hinkley Point B.

Deep-Mined Coal

16. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current deep-mined coal production per man-day in United Kingdom mines; and what were the comparable figures in 1983, 1979 and 1974, respectively.

Mr. Peter Walker: Deep-mined revenue output per man shift in 1985-86 to 22 June was 2·35 tonnes. Average figure for 1983-84 were 2·43 tonnes, for 1979-80 2·31 tonnes, and for 1974-75 2·29 tonnes.

Efficiency and Conservation

17. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps the energy efficiency office is taking to sponsor projects in schools and colleges of further education to promote greater interest in energy efficiency and conservation.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficiency Office is supporting a number of successful projects which stimulate interest in energy efficiency and promote wider knowledge about energy efficiency in educational establishments.

Coal Mining Industry (Employees Participation)

18. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made in finding ways of giving National Coal Board employees more direct participation in the running of the coal mining industry.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government will look positively at any plans put forward by miners themselves to take a more direct stake in their collieries.

Cross-Channel Cable Link

19. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are his Department's forecasts of the energy implications of the pending completion of the cross-Channel cable link.

Mr. Goodlad: The link will help the electricity utilities on both sides of the channel to operate more efficiently.

National Coal Board (Chairman)

20. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received advocating the dismissal of the chairman of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: Primarily the predictable and politically motivated calls for dismissal from Labour Members.

National Working Miners Committee

22. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has had from the National Working Miners Committee concerning transfer arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Transfers of men within the coal industry are matters for the National Coal Board.

Blidworth Colliery, Notts

23. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the recent visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) to Blidworth colliery, Nottinghamshire.

Mr. David Hunt: I was very pleased to have the opportunity to visit Blidworth colliery on 25 June with my hon. Friends the Members for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and Basildon (Mr. Amess) and to meet some of the Nottinghamshire miners who kept working through the strike.

I found Blidworth a good example of how the colliery review procedure can be used contructively by the unions working with management to improve results and overcome problems.

Offshore Oilfields

24. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those offshore oilfields currently in production which are now at or beyond the stage of peak production; and which fields he expects to have completed production in 10 years time.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's written reply to him on 10 May 1985 at column 507.

Coal Sales

25. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the level of sales of coal to industrial users.

Mr. David Hunt: There is every prospect of level of the sales of coal to industrial users recovering well after the strike provided the industry as a whole is able to re-establish confidence in coal.

Energy Efficiency Office (Budget)

26. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he intends to increase the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office for projects to mark energy efficiency year in 1986.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Energy Efficiency Office's budget for the current year represents a substantial increase over past expenditure. Expenditure by outside organisations on energy efficiency will bring spending directly related to the year to a very high level.

Scotland (Coal Mining)

27. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent discussions he has had with the National Coal Board concerning the long-term prospects of coal mining in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend's and my discussions with the chairman and others from the National Coal Board are wide-ranging and have covered the substantial investment the board is making in the coal industry in Scotland.

Gas Industry (Privatisation)

28. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy how he intends to ensure consumer safety in the gas industry subsequent to privatisation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The proposed legislation will contain the necessary references to safety. After privatisation responsibility for the gas safety regime will remain with the Health and Safety Executive.

Energy Efficiency Year

29. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report progress in planning initiatives for energy efficiency year in 1986.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have formed a strategy steering committee which includes the chairmen of the major energy utilities, chairmen of major industrial and retailing organisations and a number of industrial personalities connected with the energy efficiency industry.

A major compaign is being prepared in which advertising by the Energy Efficiency Office will be supported by promotional advertising activities by a substantial number of industries and concerns.

A major nationwide competition for domestic users will be launched.

A series of briefing conferences on the latest in energy technology will be organised throughout the nation.

We are preparing a calendar of events in collaboration with others and already more than 300 events are being organised.

Energy Secretary (USA)

31. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next intends meeting the United States of America's Energy Secretary.

Mr. Peter Walker: We have no plans to meet in the near future.

Electricity Supply Industry (Privatisation)

32. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for the privatisation of the electricity supply industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: There are no present plans to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Coal Imports

33. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if there has been a significant reduction in coal imports since 1 March.

Mr. David Hunt: Coal imports reduced in May—the last month for which figures are available—but it is too early to judge the significance of this reduction.

Energy Study Competition

30. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the conclusions reached by the winners of the energy study United Kingdom competition; and whether his Department propose to take any measures in the light of those conclusions.

Mr. David Hunt: All the entries of the energy study United Kingdom competition winners showed that energy efficiency measures in the home are cost effective and can bring real benefits in cash and/or comfort to householders. This message is at the heart of my right hon. Friend's energy efficiency campaign, which will be significantly enhanced during 1986—energy efficiency year.

Insulation Programmes

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what requests for information have been received by the Energy Efficiency Office from local authorities in the United Kingdom regarding domestic insulation programmes.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficiency Office receives a number of requests from local authorities on matters pertaining to domestic energy efficiency, and responds positively. Increasing energy efficiency in the home forms a vital part of my right hon. Friend's campaign to cut energy waste.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to the answer of 5 July, he will list the amounts of plutonium for civil purposes exported to each of the countries listed; and what was the origin of the plutonium exported not derived from fuel imported and reprocessed by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Goodlad: No. The information requested is commercially sensitive.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Walker: My ministerial colleagues and I aim to reply to most inquiries from right hon. and hon. Members within 10 working days, but some complex questions may take longer.

Miners (Redundancy)

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy what guidance he has given to the National Coal Board about payments of redundancy benefit to miners who accepted voluntary redundancy and are not yet in receipt of unemployment pay due to the adjudicating officer's decision that such persons were not entitled to unemployment benefit.

Mr. David Hunt: My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security announced on 24 June that legislation was being introduced to maintain the policy that, for the purposes of unemployment benefit, those made redundant should not be regarded as having left voluntarily, even though they may have volunteered or agreed to be dismissed; and that extra-statutory payments would be made to any claimant losing benefit on these grounds before the amendment is introduced.

Entitlement to weekly benefit under the Government's redundant mineworkers payments scheme is linked to eligibility for unemployment benefit. I am therefore arranging that where under these circumstances a man would be entitled to RMPS weekly benefit but for the fact that his payments of unemployment benefit were extra-statutory he will also receive an extra-statutory payment of RMPS weekly benefit.

Dismissed Miners

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will ask the chairman of the National Coal Board to report to him the outcome of its review of the cases of dismissed miners, whether all cases have been reviewed and whether each miner has had the opportunity to put his case.

Mr. David Hunt: The National Coal Board continues to review the cases of all miners dismissed as a result of the recent strike. The majority of cases that have been taken to industrial tribunals have yet to be heard.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Education Committees

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether a change in local authority standing orders which had the result that co-opted members of its education committee had fewer rights than elected members would be regarded by him as of such significance that the local authority would have to resubmit its education committee scheme under circular 8/73.

Mr. Dunn: The Education Act 1944 requires local education authorities to establish education committees in accordance with arrangements approved by my right hon. Friend. If an authority subsequently wished to change those arrangements, it would need to seek fresh approval.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many of the co-opted members of the education committees of each local authority are (a) co-opted teachers, (b) co-opted church representatives, (c) co-opted parent representatives, (d) co-opted political representatives and (e) co-opted others.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on 11 June at column 425. It is not possible to go beyond the detail given in that reply except at disproportionate cost.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Sir Keith Joseph: The best estimate that I can make is that during the past year the average time taken was 33 working days.

Higher Education (Expenditure)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will express expenditure on higher education as a percentage of total public sector education expenditure in each of the last 10 years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1985, c. 30-31]: The information requested is as follows:

*Expenditure on higher education as percentage of total public expenditure on education

	per cent.
1974-75	17·3
1975-76	18·5
1976-77	21·9
1977-78	22·0
1978-79	22·2
1979-80	22·9
1980-81	23·2
1981-82	23·1
1983-84	23·5

* The expenditure figures in respect of higher education have been necessarily estimated. These, and the figures relating to total education expenditure are consistent with those published in the White Paper on Expenditure (Cmnd. 9428), ie they relate to current expenditure by local authorities in England on schools, institutions of higher and further education, and the youth service; central Government expenditure on universities in Great Britain and voluntary and direct grant colleges in England; and student awards in England and Wales.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will express expenditure on higher education as a percentage of gross national product in each of the last 10 years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1985, c. 30]: It is more realistic to express such expenditure as a percentage of the gross domestic product. The following figures have been calculated accordingly.

*United Kingdom expenditure on higher education as percentage of GDP

Year
1974-75	1·0
1975-76	1·1
1976-77	1·2
1977-78	1·1
1978-79	1·1
1979-80	1·1
1980-81	1·1
1981-82	1·1
1983-84	1·1

* The expenditure figures in respect of higher education have been necessarily estimated.

Higher Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the numbers, both in absolute terms and expressed as a percentage of the relevant age group going on to university or to degree term courses in central institutions, further education colleges or colleges of education or in other similar education institutions in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) Wales, for each of the last 20 years, giving figures for each year; and what percentage received degrees.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985, c. 352]: The numbers from each country within Great Britain are not readily available and, therefore, no meaningful percentages of the relevant age group in each country can be calculated. The readily available numbers of first-year first degree home students in universities and public sector higher education studying in England and the numbers in universities in Wales and in Scotland are as follows:

Academic Year	*England	Wales†	Scotland†
1983-84	102,799	4,432	9,681
1982-83	105,463	4,846	10,014
1981-82	104,035	4,805	10,517
1980-81	97,454	5,218	10,849
1979-80	94,423	4,881	10,286
1978-79	90,078	5,021	10,272
	England and Wales‡
1977-78	94,279		9,872
1976-77	89,550		9,843
1975-76	76,357		9,552

* All higher education.
† Universities only.
‡ Separate figures for Wales for these years are not readily available. University and public sector higher education students are included. Public sector first degree courses in Scotland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and since 1978 those in Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

It is not known what percentage of entrants obtain degrees but the available numbers of first degrees awarded to home students by universities in Wales and Scotland and by universities and the Council for National Academic Awards in England are:

First degrees awarded in	England†*	Wales‡	Scotland‡
1983	80,200	4,700	9,500
1982	76,700	4,600	8,900
1981	73,100	4,500	9,000
1980	71,700	4,100	8,600

SCOTLAND

Judges

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied that the increase in the number of judges in Scotland will prevent long delays in the Scottish courts.

Mr. Ancram: If the draft Maximum Number of Judges (Scotland) Order is approved, the increase of one in the number of judges, together with the saving of judicial time from the transfer of a substantial proportion of divorce proceedings to the sheriff courts and a number of other steps which are in hand, should contribute to the more satisfactory disposal of business, particularly in the Court of Session.

Ross Hall Hospital

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the medical safety standards at the Ross Hall hospital were last inspected; and what was the outcome.

Mr. John MacKay: Responsibility for the inspection of standards at Ross Hall hospital lies with Greater Glasgow health board, which last inspected the premises in November 1984. The accommodation and facilities were found to meet the required standards.

Forestry Commission (Meetings)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when officials of the Forestry Commission last met at a national level representatives of (a) the Council for the Protection of Rural England, (b) the Royal Society for Nature Conservation and (c) the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, to discuss forestry matters of mutual interest; and when they next propose to do so.

Mr. John MacKay: Forestry Commission officials met representativew of these organisations at the broadleaves seminar held on 8 May 1985. The Royal Society for Nature Conservation and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds were also represented at a meeting between the commission and Wildlife Link on 17 June 1985. Further meetings are expected to be held in the course of the next two months.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when representatives of the Forestry Commission last met at a national level staff of the Nature Conservancy Council to discuss general forestry matters of mutual interest; and when they next propose to do so.

Mr. John MacKay: Officers from Forestry Commission headquarters have had a number of meetings over the past year with their counterparts in the Nature Conservancy Council to discuss particular topics. Formal meetings are held each year at national level in England and Scotland, and more frequently at regional level in Wales, to discuss a range of issues of mutual interest. The last such meeting at a national level took place in November 1984 and the next is planned for September 1985.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the chairman or director general of the Forestry Commission last met the chairman or director general of (a) the Nature Conservancy Council, (b) the Country Commission, (c) the Countryside Commission for Scotland, (d) the Council for the Protection of Rural England, (e) the Royal Society for Nature Conservation and (f) the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, to discuss forestry matters of mutual interest.

Mr. John MacKay: The chairman of the Forestry Commission is frequently in contact with the chairmen of the Nature Conservancy Council, the Countryside Commission and the Countryside Commission for Scotland. They met together on a formal basis last November to discuss a range of issues of mutual interest. The director general of the Forestry Commission met the general secretary of the Royal Society for Nature Conservation in March of this year. No such meeting has taken place recently with the Council for the Protection of Rural England or with the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, though the director general expects to visit the headquarters of the RSPB later this year.

Peterhead-Aberdeen Trunk Road

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to upgrade the Peterhead to Aberdeen trunk road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My replies to my hon. Friend's questions of 26 March 1985 at columns 82-84 listed the dual carriageway and other major improvement schemes planned on the A92 and A952. Other schemes are proposed at the North Donside road roundabout, Longhaven village and between Ivernettie and Stirling village. Start dates for all schemes will depend on the satisfactory completion of design and statutory procedures and on the availability of resources.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Younger: A precise reply could not be produced in respect of the period stated without disproportionate cost. A random sample, however, taken for the period from 1 May 1984 to 30 April 1985 suggests the average time from the date of a Member of Parliament's letter to the date of a substantive reply was about [illegible] days.

Health Contracts

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) laundry, (b) catering and (c) cleaning contracts in National Health Service hospitals in Scotland have been privatised in the last year; and how many National Health Service employees in each category have been made redundant following privatisation.

Mr. Younger: In the past year, besides re-letting a number of contracts for support services, health boards and the Common Services Agency have let three more contracts and are now preparing to seek tenders for other support services. I have asked them to report on these contracts as they are let. No redundancies have been involved to date.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the 1985 nurses' pay award in Scotland will be paid by the Scottish health boards from their current budget; and if he will express that proportion as a total amount.

Mr. Younger: The whole cost of this year's pay award to nursing staff in Scotland, approximately £28 million, will be met from health board's existing budgets.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of beds available in the National Health Service in Scotland expressed by specialisation in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: The information on the total number of beds available by specialty in the National Health Service in Scotland is published annually in Scottish Health Statistics (table 6.4 in 1979 and 1980 and table 6.3 in 1981, 1982 and 1983), copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients have been transferred from the Ross Hall hospital to National Health Service hospitals since the hospital opened.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Electronics Industry (Statistics)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on what basis the statutory returns of the Engineering Training Board, and his own estimates, differ for the number of employees in electronics in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Industry Department for Scotland (IDS) estimates of the number of employees in electronics in Scotland and estimates produced by the Engineering Industry Training Board (EITB) differ mainly because they are based on different groups of activity headings from the 1980 standard industrial classifications. IDS estimates represent employment in activity headings: 3302, 3433, 3441, 3442, 3443, 3444, 3453, 3454, 3710 and 3732. The EITB has defined electronics to comprise activity headings 3301, 3302, 3441, 3442, 3443, 3444, 3452, 3453 and 3454.

If this difference in definition is removed, the difference in estimates from the respective sources in 1983 are relatively minor. They are likely to reflect differences in (1) the times of the year to which the estimates refer; (2) the classification of units to activity headings; (3) reporting by companies.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the staff levels for each year since 1979, inclusive, in the ambulance service in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: Staff numbers of the Scottish ambulance service, in whole-time equivalents, at September of each year, were:

Year	Numbers
1979	1,943·5
1980	2,018·8
1981	2,022·8
1982	*2,049·0
1983	2,073·5
1984	2,074·8

* Numbers of administrative and clerical staff in 1982 are estimated.

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of patients in Scotland who are on National Health Service waiting lists for (a) urgent treatment and (b) non-urgent treatment; and what were the numbers in each category for each year since 1979.

Mr. Younger: This information is not available in precisely the form requested. The numbers on waiting lists in Scotland at 30 September in the years in question were as follows:

Year	Numbers
1979	70,970
1980	67,180
1981	65,024
1982	86,179
1983	88,213
1984	*83,061

* Provisional.

The increase in waiting lists caused by industrial action in 1982 is now being steadily reduced. Lists tend to overstate numbers of patients waiting for treatment since they include duplicated entries and patients who no longer need treatment.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average waiting time for National Health Service patients in Scotland requiring (a) urgent treatment and (b) non-urgent treatment in each year since 1979.

Mr. Younger: This information is not available in precisely the form requested. The mean waiting times (in days) for all in-patient treatment in Scotland in the years in question were as follows:

Year	Days
1979	79
1980	75
1981	73
1982	67
1983	98

The increase in 1983 reflects the effect of industrial action of 1982.

The 1984 statistics are not yet available.

NHS Employees

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the total numbers employed by the National Health Service in Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Younger: The number of people employed by the National Health Service in Scotland at 30 September in each year since 1979 is as follows:

Year	Numbers	Whole-time equivalent
1979	136,872	115,483·5
1980	139,122	118,895·9
1981	143,531	122,467·9
1982	145,429	124,010·6
1983	146,124	124,491·3
1984	144,998	123,502·8

Health Boards

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the indicative allowance available to individual health boards for support-funded projects during the current financial year giving details for each health board of the amount already committed and the amount available for new projects.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is given in the table. It is for boards to decide whether to contribute more or less than the indicative levels from their revenue allocations.

Edinburgh District Council (Expenditure)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much he estimates the Edinburgh district council could reduce its expenditure by submitting services to competitive tender.

Mr. Ancram: I do not have the information that could serve as a basis for any such estimate. The experience of councils which have tested the market suggests, however, that considerable savings can be made.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantial answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However a sample of all letters from right hon. and hon. Members answered by Treasury Ministers in June 1985 suggests that the average time taken to provide a substantive answer is a little over a month.

VAT (Health)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to extend value added tax to private treatment on the National Health Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. It remains Government policy that all hospital treatment and medical treatment by registered practitioners, whether provided within the National Health Service or outside it, shall be exempt from value added tax.

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the value added tax income from (a) medical insurance premiums, (b) private hospital charges and (c) consultants' fees in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Hayhoe: These items are exempt from value added tax.

Customs Officials

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of customs officials employed at each airport and port between 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret to have to say that to list the number of customs officials employed at each airport and port between 1979-1985 would require considerable research and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The total number of Customs and Excise staff employed on customs duties at ports, airports and inland premises for each of the years 1979 to 1985 is set out as follows:

	Number
1979	7,591
1980	7,231
1981	7,088
1982	6,861
1983	6,717
1984	6,552
1985*	6,701

* Provisional.

Average Earnings

Mrs. Roe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of minutes or hours of work a male manual labourer on average earnings needed to complete in each of the years 1975 to 1985, respectively, in order to earn the average retail price in that year of the following items (a) weekly rent of a three bedroomed council dwelling, (b) weekly mortgage repayment on a newly built semi-detached house, (c) five gallons of petrol, (d) monthly second class railway season ticket—Brighton/Victoria, (e) large loaf of bread, (f) 20 cigarettes, (g) one pint of beer, (h) one bottle of whisky, (i) dinner for two in a restaurant, (j) a dishwasher, (k) a pair of shoes, (l) oil central heating for a three bedroomed dwelling for one week and (m) two pounds of lamb.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Capital Gains

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the estimated annual yield of the treatment under income tax of all realised capital gains as investment income;

(2) what is the estimated yield of the treatment under income tax of all capital gains as they accrue as investment income.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Caribbean Area

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost of maintaining the United Kingdom's military commitments in the Caribbean area (a) including and (b) excluding Belize.

Mr. Lee: The extra cost of maintaining the Belize garrison is estimated to be about £7 million a year at 1984-85 prices. No significant extra costs arise from other deployments in the area.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Caribbean countries from which officers attended courses in defence establishments in the United Kingdom for each year since 1982.

Mr. Lee: Service personnel from the following Caribbean countries and territories have attended defence courses in the United Kingdom since 1982: Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Guyana, Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Kitts, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago.

Russian Speakers

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the number of officers within the services, including the Territorial Army and Reserves, who are fluent Russian speakers; and if he is satisfied with the numbers.

Mr. Lee: There are 190 officers within the services, including the Territorial Army and Reserves, who have qualified to interpreter standard in Russian. We are satisfied that this is sufficient.

Departmental Police

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the strength of his Department's police; and how many are stationed outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The current strength of the Ministry of Defence police is 4,213. No Ministry of Defence police officers are stationed outside the United Kingdom.

NATO

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish details of the United Kingdom's contribution to the common defence of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation by comparison with United Kingdom North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies on spending allocated to capital expenditure and naval force tonnage.

Mr. Heseltine: A comparison of figures for NATO allies (as well as for Japan) is given in the annual report to Congress by the United States Secretary for Defence on "Allied Contributions to the Common Defense". I am placing in the Library a copy of the 1985 report which gives figures mainly for calendar year 1983 as the most recent for which complete information is available. This shows that, in that year, the United Kingdom percentage spent on capital expenditure of about 45 per cent. was followed by 36 per cent. for the United States and less than 35 per cent. for European allies. In terms of naval force tonnage, the report to Congress ranks the United Kingdom second with about 11 per cent. of the NATO total, well ahead of other European allies.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Heseltine: In the 12 months from 1 June 1984 to 31 May 1985 right hon. and hon. Members sent nearly 7,000 letters to Ministers in my Department. A sample of these suggests that the average time between the date of a letter and the date of a substantive reply is about 26 days. This period includes the time (sometimes several days) between the date of a right hon. or hon. Member's letter and the date of receipt in my Department.

Submarine Berths, Portsmouth

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the intended operational function for the three new submarine berths to be built at Portsmouth.

Mr. Lee: There are no submarine berths at the Portsmouth naval base nor are there plans to build any. There is a main jetty at Gosport which currently provides berths for three 'O' class submarines. The berths are to be dredged to enable them to accommodate the new Upholder class of submarines.

Military Traffic Incident, Helensburgh

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the reply of 28 June, Official Report, column 516, if he will give more details of the cause and nature of the traffic accident involving two vehicles in a military convoy in Helensburgh on Thursday 20 June.

Mr. Stanley: The minor accident referred to involved one military vehicle running into another military vehicle immediately ahead of it at a very slow speed and is the subject of an inquiry in accordance with standard procedures.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the approved list of consultant architects engaged by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; and if he will list the number and value of contracts awarded to each consultant architect in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, who has advised me that a register of consultant architects whom the Executive is prepared to consider employing is available for examination at the executive's headquarters. Information on the number and value of contracts awarded to each consultant architect in each of the last five years is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Portaferry to Strangford Ferry

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many days in the current year there has only been one ferryboat operating between Portaferry and Strangford due to technical problems; what proposals he has to overcome this problem; if he has received complaints about the service in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Other than at peak holiday periods the service normally operates using one vessel. A service was maintained for every day this year except for a 12 hour period on 1-2 May and a six-day period from 8-13 June. These breaks in service were caused by mechanical failure occurring simultaneously in the main vessel and in the back-up vessel.

The Department of the Environment has received complaints about the service in the current year but repairs have been completed and normal service has resumed. Regular planned maintenance is carried out annually on both ferries.

Prison Service

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average basic salary excluding allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

Governor I	22,605
Governor II	20,283
Governor III	16,744
Governor IV	13,455
Assistant Governor	11,654
Assistant Governor (Trainee)	11,219
Chief Officer I	10,643
Chief Officer II	9,854
Principal Officer	8,084
Senior Officer	7,217
Basic Grade Officer	5,969

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average gross salary including allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

Governor I	28,236
Governor II	25,203
Governor III	20,542
Governor IV	17,568
Assistant Governor	15,767
Assistant Governor (Trainee)	15,332
Chief Officer I	19,530
Chief Officer II	18,642
Principal Officer	18,821
Senior Officer	17,845
Basic Grade Officer	16,439

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The average overtime worked by grades eligible for overtime pay (those below governor grades) was 17.32 hours per week for the financial year 1984-85. Information providing a grade-by-grade breakdown could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of officers had a gross salary in excess of (a) £13,000, (b) £14,000 and (c) £15,000 for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

i. In excess of £13,000—92.56 (includes ii and iii)
ii. In excess of £14,000—81.53 (includes iii)
iii. In excess of £15,000—72.45

District Heating

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Housing Executive on the breakdown of charges made for district heating on the Springfarm estate, Antrim, including information as to the fuel, maintenance and other components of such charges.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available. I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will instruct the Housing Executive to investigate ways of providing tenants who do not wish, or cannot afford, to use the district heating system, with an electric immersion heater.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available. I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Vehicle Weight Tests

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current availability of heavy commercial vehicle inspection stations in the light of the provisions in the Road Traffic Transport and Roads (Northern Ireland) Order 1984 exempting such vehicles from the requirement to undergo a weight test if, when stopped, they are further than five miles from the nearest inspection station; and what are the implications for the enforcement of maximum legal weight for this class of vehicle.

Mr. Chris Patten: Article 206 of the Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 empowers a constable or a person authorised by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland to require a vehicle to be weighed and for that purpose to proceed to a weighbridge. If the point at which the requirement is made is more than five miles from the weighbridge, and the vehicle on being weighed is found to be within the limits authorised, the Department is liable for loss occasioned.

To meet the requirements of this provision the Department operates weighbridges sited at key traffic points throughout the Province whilst a number are available on an agency basis.

Heavy Lorries

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prosecutions have been made under the Road Traffic, Transport and Roads (Northern Ireland) Order 1984 against persons who have driven heavy vehicles on the public highway which have been in excess of the permitted maximum axle weight; and in how many cases a conviction resulted.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: A total of 282, all of which resulted in convictions.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what additional resources have been made available to enforce the provisions of the Road Traffic, Transport and Roads (Northern Ireland) Order 1984 with regard to vehicle inspection and illegal parking of heavy commercial vehicles.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the existing resources of the Department of the Environment and Royal Ulster Constabulary are sufficient to enforce the provisions of this order.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prosecutions have been made under the Road Traffic, Transport and Roads (Northern Ireland) Order 1984 against persons who have parked heavy vehicles on verges or footways; in how many cases a conviction resulted; and how many of those convicted were resident within Northern Ireland and how many in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: During the short period for which this legislation has been in force, no one has been prosecuted for offences committed in contravention of its provisions.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum penalty for parking a heavy vehicle on a verge or footway; and, in how many cases a conviction has been followed by the imposition of the maximum penalty.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: £400; during the short period for which this legislation has been in force, there have been no prosecutions (and hence no convictions) under it.

Bomb Attacks (Newry and Killeen)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on the investigation into the mortar attacks at Newry and the car bomb attacks at the courthouse in Newry on 3 April and at Killeen on 20 May, indicating how many investigating officers were involved, their ranks, how many hours they spent on this inquiry, whether they sought to reconstruct the scenes of the incidents concerned, how many pages their report to the Chief Constable occupied, what conclusions were reached in their report about the operational dispositions of the police before, during and after each incident, what recommendations were made to the Chief Constable, and to what extent these have been implemented; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report, with particular reference to the adequacy of the personal protection provided to the police officers involved.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: My right hon. Friend and I have received confidential reports on each of these tragic incidents from the Chief Constable.

It would not be right, and could seriously impede the continuing police investigations, if I were to announce their contents.

Pensions

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pensioners in Northern Ireland receive reduced pensions because they are in receipt of private pensions or other incomes.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985]: The information is as follows:

Type of Income	Numbers of Pensioners
Earnings	80
Occupational pension (Guaranteed Minimum Pension)	14,211
Another Benefit	185

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Testing

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will make it their policy to declare a moratorium on nuclear testing, subject to super power compliance, as a first step to the signing of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: No. The problems involved in ensuring adequate compliance with a moratorium on nuclear testing would be at least as great as in the case of a comprehensive test ban. As I told the House on 7 June, during the adjournment debate, we continue to seek real progress towards a comprehensive test ban. As recently as 11 July, we tabled an important working paper on the subject at the Geneva Conference on Disarmament.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards the proposal from the Soviet Union for a nuclear weapons testing moratorium to start on 6 August; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Meirionydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) on 8 May.

South West Africa People's Organisation

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the South West Africa People's Organisation leaders in the past five years concerning bomb explosions in Namibia for which the South West Africa People's Organisation has claimed responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: SWAPO is well aware that we condemn all acts of violence in Namibia, whether commited by SWAPO or by the South African security forces or by others. My right hon. and learned Friend made our position on this absolutely clear during his recent meeting with Mr. Nujoma.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about his recent meeting with Mr. Sam Nujoma of the South West African People's Organisation, including the matters discussed.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend recently met the President of SWAPO, as he meets all the parties to the Namibia negotiations. Mr. Nujoma and he reaffirmed their support for Security Council resolution 435 and discussed how best to achieve its implementation. My right hon. and learned Friend stressed our commitment to the path of peaceful negotiation.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any states have indicated an intention to withdraw from the non-proliferation treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We are not aware of any such intention. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) on 27 June.

Ministers (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the programme of already announced overseas visits, together with their purpose, for himself and for each Minister in his Department between July and December; and if he will list the programme of already announced overseas visitors to the United Kingdom he expects to meet in the same period.

Mr. Renton: The programme of visits already announced for Ministers in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is as follows:

		Nature of visit
Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs

Discussions are taking place with representatives of Governments regarding a number of overseas visitors to Britain whom my right hon. and learned Friend expects to meet during this period. However, no announcement is made regarding forthcoming visits until arrangements have been completed and the Government concerned agrees to advance publicity.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what study he is making of foreign vessels fishing in the area of the South Sandwich Islands and the Shag Rocks.

Mr. Renton: No systematic study is being made of foreign vessels fishing in the remote areas of South Sandwich Islands and the Shag Rocks.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will seek to extend the 1980 convention for the conservation of Antarctic marine living resources to the Falkland waters.

Mr. Renton: The convention on the conservation of Antarctic marine living resources was specifically designed to deal with conservation in the Antarctic marine ecosystem which is quite different from that of Falklands waters. Extension of CCAMLR would require the unanimous consent of the parties.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the initiatives taken by Her Majesty's Government for the establishment of multilaterally-based fisheries conservation and management regime around the Falkland Islands; and what contacts are taking place with other Governments.

Mr. Renton: Our exchanges on this complex matter are best pursued confidentially.

EC (Foreign Policy)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those subjects on which the European Economic Community adopted a common foreign policy prior to 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The Nine/Ten have issued joint statements on the following topics between 1977, when the political co-operation archives began, and 1983:

1. East/West relations (including arms control matters).
2. The Arab/Israel conflict and the situation in Lebanon.
3. The CSCE process including CDE.
4. The Iran/Iraq conflict.
5. South Africa (apartheid, the EC Code of Conduct and the homelands).
6. The internal situation in Poland.
7. The Argentine invasion of the Falklands.
8. The Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan.
9. The American hostages in Tehran.
10. The progress of the Euro/Arab dialogue.
11. Human rights matters in Eastern Europe.
12. The UN Conference on the Law of the Sea.
13. The situation in Namibia.
14. The situation in Cyprus.
15. Abuse and violation of diplomatic privilege.
16. Chemical and bacteriological weapons.
17. UN matters (including UNEP, UNCTAD and UNWRA).
18. The situation in South East Asia (including Cambodia, Vietnam and refugee problems).
19. Human rights in Chile.
20. The situation in Nicaragua.
21. Majority rule and independence in Zimbabwe.
22. Civil Aviation security.
23. The situation in Zaire.
24. Human rights in Surinam.
25. The re-establishment of democracy in Turkey.

The Ten have in addition taken joint positions on a wide variety of issues at the UN, and made their joint views known to a large number of third countries on topics of common interest ranging across the whole spectrum of Foreign Affairs. Copies of the statements were placed in the Library of the House when they were issued.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Renton: For the 12-month period ended 30 June 1985 the average time taken to provide substantive answers to letters from right hon. and hon. Members by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was 12 days.

BBC External Services

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will grant extra assistance to the British Broadcasting Corporation external services to enable it to broadcast direct to South Africa on medium wave.

Mr. Renton: We have no plans to finance the installation of a medium wave transmitter capable of broadcasting to South Africa. The £100 million capital expenditure programme agreed by the Government to improve the audibility of the external services over the period 1981-1991 is fully committed. Broadcasts to South Africa are currently relayed from a number of BBC short wave transmitters.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Streptomycin

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has issued guidance to doctors that the use and dosage of streptomycin should be scaled down.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not issued such advice. The use of streptomycin has declined as alternative antibiotic therapies have become available.

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to alert foreign medical services of the side effects of the use of streptomycin.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We make information on adverse drug reactions reported in the United Kingdom available routinely to other national drug regulatory agencies through the World Health Organisation. Streptomycin has been on the market for many years and its benefits and possible adverse reactions are well known to doctors here and abroad.

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people in Britain today are known to have tinnitus due to streptomycin;

(2) how many people in Britain today are known or suspected to suffer streptomycin-induced Meniere's disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not record this information centrally. It has been long established however, that streptomycin is toxic to the ears and a warning to this effect is including in prescribing literature for streptomycin.

Industrial Death Pension

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the industrial death pension was last increased; whether he plans to bring back its value in real terms to that which existed when it was introduced; if he will estimate the pension necessary to achieve this; and if he will estimate the approximate annual cost of such an increase.

Mr. Newton: The main element of industrial death benefit—the higher permanent rate—was last increased in November 1984 from £34·60 to £36·35 a week. The benefit was introduced in 1948 at £1·50 a week and has since risen in real terms by 112 per cent.

The amount by which this benefit exceeds the national insurance widows pension has been maintained at 55 pence per week since November 1967. To restore the original lead over national insurance widows pension (20p in 1948) in real terms would require a rise of £1·73 to £2·28 a week. This would cost about £2·4 million in a full year. We have no plans for such an increase.

Pensions

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assumptions have been made about unemployment in assessing the burdens to be borne by people in employment in meeting the costs of the state earnings-related pensions scheme in its first year of full operation.

Mr. Newton: Estimates for future levels of national insurance contributions needed to pay for benefits for people over pension age are on pages 45 to 51 of volume 3 of the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9519). These are based on a range of assumptions for earnings growth, unemployment levels and demographic trends. A central long-term assumption of six per cent. unemployment has been adopted for these estimates. The effects on contribution rates of unemployment assumptions of three per cent. and 10 per cent. are also illustrated.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any fraud investigation is being undertaken or is proposed for central London into the claiming of benefit in multi-occupied board and lodging accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In the public interest it is not our practice to disclose details of our anti-fraud activity.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of suicide, or attempted suicide have been brought to his attention concerning claimants of board and lodging payments.

Mr. Whitney: Apart from the tragic occurrence debated on 28 June at column 1264, we are aware of one further reported suicide and one reported attempted suicide involving people in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Child Patients (Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many children were treated on adult wards in the Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley district health authority by hospital and by specialty for each of the last 10 years;

(2) what was the number and ratio of children's beds to adult beds in the Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley district health authority for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. My hon. Friend may care to contact the chairman of Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley health authority for the information he needs.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many representations he has received regarding the exclusion of Solpadeine tablets from the limited list; and whether he will ask the review committee to re-examine this exclusion;

(2) whether he will request the review committee relating to the limited list of drugs to consider restoring Otrivine Anticistin nasal spray or Dimotapp L.A. tablets to the list for the relief of hay fever.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received a number of letters about the exclusion of Solpadeine from National Health Service prescription. The advisory committee on NHS drugs, whose establishment my right hon. Friend announced last week, will be free to reconsider at any time the need for any scheduled drugs, either on its own initiative or in response to representations from doctors or the pharmaceutical industry. I understand that, as a result of such representations, the advisory committee will look at Dimotapp LA tablets at an early stage.

Stanley Royd Hospital (Salmonella Poisoning)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the report on the inquiry into the outbreak of salmonella poisoning at the Stanley Royd hospital, Wakefield.

Mr. John Patten: The committee of inquiry into the outbreak, under chairman John Hugill QC, completed the public hearings of oral evidence on 17 May. We are awaiting its report, and will publish the findings of the committee once we have given the report careful consideration.

Telephone Installations (Medical Need)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of telephones installed by social work departments on the basis of medical need in each relevant local authority area in Scotland and in England and Wales in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the installation costs and the additional annual cost of meeting the standing charges for these telephones.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not centrally available in the exact form requested. Data on the number of clients receiving assistance with the installation of a telephone, and on the net overall expenditure on telephones (installation and rental together) by each local authority in England and Wales are contained in "Personal Social Services Statistics 1983-84" published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. Copies of this are in the Library. Information on provision in Scotland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Births (Malformations and Handicaps)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which malformations and handicaps (a) are and (b) are not, usually detected within the first seven days of birth; and if he will specify the proportion of cases in each category.

Mr. John Patten: Notifications of congenital malformations to live and still births recognised within seven days of birth are made to district health authorities on a voluntary basis, and are forwarded to the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

It is not possible from the national scheme to indicate with any reliability the proportions of all malformations which are notified, nor to give any information on handicap.

Most defects are liable to be underreported. Major conditions frequently not detected in the first seven days after birth include those affecting hearing and vision, the cardiovascular system, and genetic and chromosomal abnormalities (including Down's syndrome). A fuller discussion of the likely extent of detection of each group of malformation is given in chapter 3 of "Congenital Malformation Statistics: notifications 1971—1980 Series MB 3 no. 1", copies of which are in the Library.

Down's Syndrome

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available to his Department as to the proportion of children with Down's syndrome whose handicap is detected within the first seven days.

Mr. John Patten: National data are not available on the proportion of children with Down's syndrome whose condition is detected in the first seven days.

A recent study has suggested that as many as 94 per cent. of subsequently confirmed Down's syndrome cases were diagnosed soon after birth, but there is reason to suppose that this percentage may vary considerably from area to area.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list in the Official Report (a) the number of amniocentesis tests carried out, (b) the number of such tests which revealed Down's syndrome, (c) the number of such cases which were terminated, and (d) the number of such cases which were carried to a completed pregnancy in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available centrally in the exact form requested. However, the tables show (a) the numbers of notifications of legal abortions where the medical condition was given as chromosomal abnormality, the majority of which are likely to be Down's syndrome and (b) the numbers of notifications of congenital malformations with Down's syndrome (live and still births) diagnosed within the first seven days after birth, for the latest available three years.

(a) Legal abortions to resident women: numbers with the principal medical condition specified as chromosomal abnormality, 1981-83

England and Wales

	1981	1982	1983
ICD (9th Rev.) 6551 chromosomal abnormality in foetus	262	288	254

(b) Numbers of babies born with Down's syndrome by type of birth, 1982-84

England and Wales

Year	Total	Liveborn	Stillborn	Not known/ not stated
1982	527	513	12	2
1984	505	488	14	3

Figures are derived from a voluntary system of notifying congenital malformations observed at birth or up to seven days after birth and are therefore an incomplete measure of the total number of affected infants.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) of 20 June, Official Report, column 196, about Down's syndrome and nuclear installations, whether he will give the age of children to whom the evidence relates; and whether the statistics referred to in the answer include cases of abortions following positive, amniocentesis tests.

Mr. John Patten: The information in my right hon. and learned Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 20 June at column 196, related to the notifications of congenital malformations recognised within seven days of birth, and did not include cases of abortions following positive amniocentesis tests.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what account he took, when formulating his conclusions based on scrutiny of the statistics of the incidence of Down's syndrome in the Sellafield area that there was no evidence from this monitoring to relate the incidence to the presence of a nuclear installation, of the age of each of the parents in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The statistics examined were the notifications of congenital malformations with Down's syndrome to live and still births recognised within seven days of birth per thousand total (live and still) births for the local health authority in which Sellafield is located. These notifications include the ages of the mothers and these were taken into account.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer of 20 June to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), he will list the studies his Department has examined in connection with his scrutiny of the possible correlation between the incidence of Down's syndrome and radioactivity from nuclear installations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The reports examined are:

British Medical Journal, volume 287, 12 November 1983, Sheehan PME, Hillary IB. An unusual cluster of babies with Down's syndrome born to former pupils of an Irish boarding school. pages 1428-1429.

Letters to British Medical Journal, volume 288, 14 January 1984, pages 146-147 Reynolds F, Wiggins RD, James WH, Sheehan PME, Hillary IB. An unusual cluster of babies with Down's syndrome. Brown A. Role of radiation in aetiology of Down's syndrome.

Letter to British Medical Journal, volume 289, 11 August 1984, page 378 Sharp PM, McConnell DJ. An unusual cluster of babies with Down's syndrome—was it caused by the Windscale fire?

Interpretation of the points raised in the reports leads to the conclusion that there is no evidence that radiation from the Windscale accident might have reached Ireland and the only factor implicating it in the causation of these genetic accidents is the coincidence of timing.

This Department and the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys routinely check the world literature, including that provided by the international clearing house for birth defects monitoring systems, and no substantive reports on the possible association between the incidence of Down's syndrome and radioactivity from nuclear installations are known.

Operation Costs

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest available average costings for a tonsillectomy/adenoidectomy, OPCS code 233, repair of inguinal hernia (411), Haemorrhoidectomy (493), cholecystectomy (522), hysterectomy (696), total hip replacement (810), excision, internal structure of knee (820), varicose veins, ligation and stripping (893/4).

Mr. John Patten: We do not routinely make estimates of the cost of individual operations. However, an analysis done in 1981-82 in six National Health Service hospitals covering over a hundred patients would suggest that at 1984-85 prices the average revenue cost of a hernia repair would be £500, of a cholecystectomy £960, and a hysterectomy (non-malignant cases) £930. We estimate that the average cost of a total hip operation, including an element for capital, at 1984-85 prices is some £2,700. We have no reliable estimates for the other procedures.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe will be receiving a reply to his letter of 25 April, sent under urgent cover, about charging people on supplementary benefit for their home helps in the county of Essex, and about which a reminder was sent on 3 June.

Mr. Newton: I wrote to the right hon. Member today. I am very sorry that my reply was so delayed.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from hon. or right hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Congenital Diseases (Sellafield)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has carried out research into age-specific rates of incidence of congenital disease in the population of the Sellafield area, following the recommendations of the Black report.

Mr. John Patten: No. We have concentrated first on implementing recommendations 1-10 in chapter 6 of the report.

Congenital Malformation (Reporting Scheme)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the efficacy of the voluntary national scheme for reporting congenital malformations detected within the first seven days of birth as an indicator of incidences of handicap; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The primary aim of the voluntary national scheme for the notification of congenital malformations is for surveillance. The scheme was established in 1964 shortly after the thalidomide tragedy with the aim of speedily identifying any sudden increase in the prevalence of any malformation at birth.

The notification system was not intended to provide accurate figures on the overall prevalence of malformation or handicap, and its deficiencies in this respect are recognised.

However, we are satisfied that the system assists in the monitoring role intended for it. As with other regular reviews of statistics, the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and this Department are currently examining the working of the notification of congenital malformation scheme.

Private Patients

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances chest X-rays have been provided to the employees of private contract companies (a) in the Hounslow and Spelthorne health authority and (b) other district health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for individual health authorities to decide whether such arrangements are appropriate and we do not collect information on them centrally. The hon. Member may wish to approach health authority chairmen for information on the position in districts in which he is particularly interested.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the resource allocations to special health authorities are reduced by the volume of their income from private patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The revenue resources allocated to health authorities including special health authorities do not take account of any changes in the volume of income from private patients.

Mrs. Julia Hall

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up an independent inquiry into the treatment and care at St. Mary's hospital, Portsmouth and the subsequent death of Mrs. Julia Hall who died in Portsmouth on 30 August 1982.

Mr. John Patten: We are satisfied with the inquiries already made by the Portsmouth and South-East Hampshire health authority into this unfortunate incident.

Voluntary Redundancy

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when legislation will become effective which will allow unemployment benefit to be paid to persons accepting voluntary redundancy; and what instructions or guidance he has given to employment offices on this matter.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he will make to refund those miners who accepted redundancy from the National Coal Board between March and May 1985 and were refused unemployment benefit.

Mr. Newton: The proposed amendment to section 20(1)(a) of the Social Security Act 1975, which has been added to the current Social Security Bill to establish that workers made redundant are not to be regarded as having left employment voluntarily, would come into effect as soon as the Bill became law. We hope the Bill will receive Royal Assent later this month.

Workers made redundant who lose benefit for this reason before the amendment comes into effect will receive extra-statutory payments, and the Department of Employment has already issued instructions to its local offices to identify these claimants from the records of voluntary unemployment decisions.

Income Support

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is his intention under the proposals in "The Reform of Social Security" to pay an extra rate of income support to a claimant who has an adult dependent partner.

Mr. Newton: As stated in chapter 2 of "Reform of Social Security", volume 2 (Cmnd. 9518), we intend to pay separate rates of income support to couples, and to continue to aggregate their needs and resources.

Sterile Intravenous Fluids

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any representations from manufacturers of sterile intravenous fluids in the United Kingdom about the effect of health authorities' contractual policies on their viability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have had no direct representations from manufacturers, but two hon. Members have written to me. I understand that three manufacturers of intravenous fluids have since made representations to the Health Service supply council, which is responsible for National Health Service supplies policy, claiming that a competitor is underpricing its products. The council has found no reason to amend the advice it gave to health authorities in 1983 about contracting for these fluids. I understand too that one firm has made a reference to the Director General of the Office of Fair Trading.

Specialist Claims Control

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the present specialist claims control exercise in Leith will terminate; how many officers are in the team; how much they are paid; and what expenses they claim on a weekly basis.

Mr. Whitney: The specialist claims control team which is at present in the local office at Edinburgh North, which covers Leith, consists of three officers and the exercise is planned to end on 16 August. The current average salary for an officer in the LOI grade is £8,923. The staff employed on this exercise can claim travelling expenses and day subsistence, where appropriate, in accordance with normal departmental rules.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 28 June, Official Report, column 529, how much benefit was saved as a result of adjustments following investigation of the 133 cases involved; and what were the respective savings due to the discovery of fraud or error on behalf of his Department's staff.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated total benefit saving was £36,760 which was all attributable to the discovery of fraud.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how global savings are calculated arising from specialist claims control exercises; what changes there have been in the method of calculation; what steps he has taken to establish the accuracy of the method used to determine savings; and what conclusions he draws as to the extent to which the savings reflect (a) fraud and (b) mismanagement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply on 12 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) at columns 482-83 and to the statement and copy report placed in the Library on that date.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 28 June, Official Report, column 529, how many of the 133 cases previously investigated represent single parents, unemployed single men, and husbands or wives with dependent children.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Health Expenditure (Peterborough)

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each year since 1974-75 for the Peterborough health district (a) the revenue allocation in actual and real terms compared to 1974-75, (b) the capital allocation in actual and real terms compared with 1974-75, (c) the number of in-patient cases treated, (d) the number of out-patient cases treated, (e) the total number of staff employed, (f) the number of doctors employed and (g) the number of nurses and midwives employed.

Mr. John Patten: The information we have available on (a) is as follows. Figures up to 1982 are not directly comparable with those from 1982 onwards because on 1 April 1982 Peterborough health district, formerly part of Cambridgeshire area health authority, became a health authority in its own right and there were some minor boundary changes.

Peterborough District Health Area

	Revenue Expenditure (£ million cash)	1983-84 prices*
1974-75	6·5	19·9
1975-76	9·1	22·1
1976-77	10·6	22·7
1977-78	12·3	23·3
1978-79	14·2	24·2
1979-80	17·6	25·7
1980-81	23·3	28·7
1981-82	26·7	29·8
1982-83	27·9	29·2
1983-84	29·9	29·9
1984-85	32·0	30·6

* The figures have been calculated using the gross domestic product deflators.

We do not have the information requested in (b) available centrally. But in any case it would not be very meaningful because capital expenditure at district level fluctuates from year to year depending on whether schemes in the district have been included in the regional capital programme. My hon. Friend may like to approach the East Anglian regional health authority direct for detailed information:

The information requested in (c) and (d) is as follows:

*NHS Hospitals, Peterborough District Health Authority

	In-patient cases	Day cases	Total out-patient attendances
1974	22,338	1,355	143,371

† Activity levels in the years 1975, 1979, 1982 were in general affected by industrial action in the health service.

‡ Provisional.

We do not have information readily available on (e), (f) and (g) and my hon. Friend may also wish to contact the Regional Health Authority about this.

Visually Handicapped Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he intends to publish in full the report of his Department's fact-finding study of local authority provisions for the visually handicapped;

(2) when he expects the report of his Department's fact-finding study of local authority provisions for the visually handicapped to be completed; how soon after that date he expects to be in a position to indicate what action he proposes to take in response to the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I hope to make an announcement about these matters shortly.

National Insurance

Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the additional revenue that will be yielded in a full financial year from removing the ceiling on employers' national insurance contributions.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary estimates that the yield in a full financial year would be £800 million.

Health Authorities (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has given to health authorities on Crown Immunity in National Health Service hospitals and contractors providing services there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 60]: No guidance on Crown Immunity in this context has been issued. Contractors providing services in hospital, who are not crown servants or agents exercising crown functions, would not be covered by Crown Immunity.

Medical Information

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the information routinely collected from health authorities and family practitioner committees; and if he will place a copy of each return form in the Library.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 57]: I have arranged for a copy of "A Guide to Health and Social Services Statistics"—a subject index of the information routinely collected by our Department—and copies of the return forms to be placed in the Library. This guide was compiled in April 1984. We are preparing an updated version and will place this in the Library in due course. The following is a list of the information included in the guide (items marked with an asterisk are returned by local authorities):

Housing Benefit

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide the latest available estimates of the total numbers of recipients of standard housing benefits, divided between rate assistance and rent assistance; how many in each category have income above and below the needs allowance; if he will give the current year and full year estimates of the expenditure saving due to the increase in the rate taper to 13 pence and estimate of the number of claimants who will be adversely affected by the taper increase without taking account of the increase in the child needs allowance; how many of these losers will lose eligibility to rate rebates altogether; and if he will as far as possible break the above estimates down as between pensioners, working householders and others.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 5 July 1985, c. 301-3]: I regret that there were two minor errors in one of the tables which accompanied my reply to the hon. Member. A corrected version follows.

Table 1. Estimated standard housing benefit caseload at November 1985
Thousands, Great Britain

Household Type	Rate Rebate Recipients			Rent Rebate or Allowance Recipients

Note: Individual items do not necessarily add up to totals because of rounding.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the cost in a full year of the improvements in (a) family income supplement and (b) the housing benefit children's needs allowance announced recently; and what is the total net cost, allowing for the interaction between the two.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 5 July 1985, c. 301]: The total net cost in 1986-87 of the uprating improvements from November 1985 in family income supplement and the housing benefit children's needs allowance, allowing for the interaction between the two benefits, is estimated to be about £23 million.

WALES

Beaches and Jetties (Public Access)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce legislation to provide a public right of access to the foreshore of beaches and to public slipways and jetties.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Highway authorities already have the power under part III of the Highways Act 1980 to create statutorily public rights of way.

Musical Education

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will initiate discussions with each of the directors of education of the local education authorities within Wales, in order to ensure that children in all areas in Wales are given an opportunity to learn to play musical instruments.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No. It is for local education authorities and schools to determine the music curriculum. My right hon. Friend is satisfied that provision in Wales, including opportunities to play musical instruments, is of a generally high standard but believes local education authorities will welcome, as he has done, the recent Her Majesty's Inspectorate publication "Music from 5-16" and its views on ways on securing a comprehensive range of provision.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Photocopying Equipment

Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal whether the photocopying equipment supplied to the parliamentary Labour party at public expense is exclusively for the use of the civil servants provided for the official Opposition.

Mr. Biffen: No.

SCOTLAND

Company Failures

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many companies supported by the Scottish Development Agency since 1975 have failed; and what has been the cost to public funds.

Mr. Allan Stewart: By 31 March 1985 the figures were 175 and £10·9 million respectively. At that date the agency had outstanding investments of £48·8 million in 850 firms.

Blood Transfusion

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Common Services Agency costing study of the supply of units by the blood transfusion service to private sector medical establishments has been completed; and if it has been decided to vary the charge to these establishments as a result.

Mr. John MacKay: No.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many units of blood were supplied to (a) commercial medical establishments and (b) other private hospitals by the Scottish blood transfusion service in each year since, and inclusive of, 1982-83; what has been the estimated cost of such supplies in each year; and what has been the revenue income in each year from charging for such supplies.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	Units of Whole Blood Supplied to the Private Sector	Revenue Received
1982-83	650	Nil
1983-84	560	£1,915
1984-85	730	£27,287

Notes:
1. Charges were introduced in November 1983.
2. The receipts relate to blood and blood products; information about receipts for whole blood only is not available.
3. Receipts will not necessarily be brought to account in the year of supply.
4. Information about costs is not available.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current charge per unit of whole blood to (a) commercial medical establishments and (b) other private hospitals in Scotland for blood supplied to them by the Scottish blood transfusion service; and if the charge has been varied since being introduced.

Mr. John MacKay: The current charge to the private sector is £19 per unit of whole blood. It will be increased very shortly.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the factors taken into account, and the financial weighting attached to each, when fixing the handling charges for blood supplied to private hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The charge is intended to cover the expenses incurred by the blood transfusion service in processing blood for supplying to the private sector. No charge is made for the blood itself.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new entrants to the labour force there have been in each year since 1974; how many new entrants he estimates there will be in the current year and in each year until 1990; and if he will express the new Scottish entrants as a proportion of all entrants to the work force in Great Britain.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 251]: The size of the civilian labour force in Scotland in 1971 and at two-yearly intervals between 1977 and 1983, the latest date for which estimates are available, is shown in the following table; this is based mainly on the labour force survey. Estimates for 1984 and labour force projections are under preparation. The table also shows the changes in the civilian labour force in Scotland between the years for which information is available, and the corresponding changes for Great Britain.

Electronics Industry

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many companies in Scotland are operating in the electronic manufacturing sector and how many in the research and development and software sectors; and what information he has as to how many of the electronic manufacturing firms also maintain research and development units in Scotland.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 256]: Information is not available on the basis requested. The latest results from the census of employment show that in 1981 the numbers of units classified directly to the electronics manufacturing industry, the research and development industry and the computer services industry in terms of the 1980 standard industrial classification (SIC) were as follows:

Industry	Number of Units
Electronics	433
Research and development	117
Computer services	149

These figures do not include units engaged in these activities which are classified to other industries in the 1980 SIC.

I have no comprehensive information on the extent of research and development undertaken by electronics manufacturing companies in Scotland. The hon. Member may wish to refer, however, to the Scottish "Economic Bulletin No. 29 of 1984", pp 9-10, which explores the results of a 1981 survey of employment in research and development. A copy of the "Bulletin" is in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Community Budget (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate of the dollar/ecu exchange rate was used in determining the level of agricultural spending contained in the 1986 draft EEC budget.

Mr. Jopling: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assumption regarding the increase in cereal prices was made in deciding on (a) the limit for EEC agricultural spending in 1986 and (b) the 1986 draft budget.

Mr. Jopling: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all categories of agricultural and rural spending or support not included in the 20·6 billion ecu limit on EEC agricultural spending for 1986; and if he will state for each category (a) the level of spending in 1984, (b) the level of spending for 1985 and (c) the estimated level of spending as contained in the 1986 preliminary draft budget.

Mr. Jopling: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dieldrin

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what levels of Dieldrin were found by the analyses carried out upon the dead herons found on the River Avon near Evesham; and if he will report on the efforts made to locate the source of this pollution.

Mrs. Fenner: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which uses of Dieldrin are likely to be approved once the Food and Environment Protection Bill becomes law.

Mrs. Fenner: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Grain Storage

Mr. Wareing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the refusal of the Home Grown Cereals Authority to accept Merseyside companies offering space for the storage of EEC intervention board grain; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish details of his allocation by area of the 50,000 additional community programme places recently announced.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I set out current targets for the expansion of the community programme in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 30 April at column 105. The Manpower Services Commission is consulting area manpower boards about distributing places available at regional level, and this will be taken into account in the allocation of the remaining 50,000 places.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, in the light of the recent court judgment regarding the compatibility with the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 of the rules for eligibility for women in respect of the community programme, he will make a statement on the future provision of places for women on the programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We are awaiting the published decision of the industrial tribunal in the case of Mrs. Chandler and will consider its implications for the community programme.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps have been taken to ensure the involvement of young people in the planning and execution of the youth training scheme, and in particular, trainee representatives on area manpower boards and programme review teams.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Trainee involvement in the youth training scheme takes place at a number of levels. At the individual level, trainees are involved in shaping their training programmes through the regular contact with scheme staff which is one of the requirements of the scheme. At programme level, sponsors are encouraged to set up programme review teams which include trainee representatives. The commission's aim under the forthcoming two-year youth training scheme is that all programmes should have such teams from April 1987.

At area level, individual area manpower boards may include organisations representing trainees' interests through co-option or by invitation, and some already do so. The composition of area manpower boards is currently under review. At national level, the youth training board includes a member from the British Youth Council, who represents the interests of young people.

Textile Industry

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently employed in the textile industry in the Staffordshire, Moorlands constituency.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information on employment in local areas is from the September 1981 census of employment. Industrial breakdowns are not available for constituencies but in the area covered by the jobcentre areas of Leek, Longton, Cheadle, Biddulph, Burslem and Hanley, which corresponds most closely to the Staffordshire Moorlands constituency, there were just over 2,700 employees employed in the textile industry (class 43 of the standard industrial classification 1980) at September 1981.

Remploy Ltd.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the total grants made to Remploy Ltd. since 1979; what was the annual loss made by the company in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Grants are made by the Manpower Services Commission to Remploy to finance the company's excess of expenditure over income and capital expenditure. The information requested (available by financial year only) is as follows:

£000's

Financial year	Grants			Annual operating loss
	Revenue	Capital	Total
1978-79	22,530	2,422	24,952	—
1979-80	27,263	3,764	31,027	—
1980-81	35,236	6,943	42,178	—
1981-82	39,195	6,493	45,688	42,222
1982-83	42,442	6,658	49,100	43,408
1983-84	44,572	7,331	51,903	46,335
1984-85	47,825	8,745	56,570	49,290

Both the Government and Remploy are anxious to improve the company's cost effectiveness and I have agreed with Remploy a plan which aims to reduce per capital costs by 12 per cent. to the level of disabled employment costs by 1987-88. I shall be keeping the position and the scope for further improvements in cost effectiveness under close review.

School Leavers (Brent)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Brent, South on 9 July, Official Report, column 416, how many of the 618 unemployed claimants in Brent, who have not had employment since leaving full-time education, have been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available.

Religious Discrimination

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to prohibit religious discrimination in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government deplore all unfair discrimination, including discrimination on the grounds of religious belief. However, they do not consider that either the scale or the nature of such discrimination makes legislation an appropriate solution.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest available figure for the number of school age children whose head of household has been unemployed for a period of (a) one to two years, (b) two to three years, (c) over three years and (d) over two years, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: Figures are not available in the precise form requested. According to the labour force survey conducted in the spring of 1984, there were 421,000 children in total under the age of 16 whose head of household had been unemployed for between one and two years, and 1,011,000 children whose head of household had been unemployed for two years of more. Separate figures are not available for children of school age, or unemployment durations beyond two years.

Putney Gas Explosion

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the report of the Health and Safety Executive on the Putney gas explosion will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I understand the report to the Health and Safety Commission will be published shortly. When it is I will make a statement pursuant to this reply and place a copy of the report in the Library.

Wages Councils

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the responses which his Department has received in reply to his proposals in respect of wages councils expressed support for his policy.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The consultative paper made clear the Government's position that change is needed. The responses to the paper suggest considerable support for this view.

Road Haulage Industry

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the number of people employed in the road haulage industry in 1960 and in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives, for the dates specified, the estimated number of employees in employment in the road haulage industry in Great Britain. The Department's employment statistics are analysed according to the standard industrial classification (SIC). The figures for June 1960 to June 1981 are for minimum list headings (MLHs) 703 and 704 of the 1968 SIC while those for June 1982 to June 1984 are for group 723 of the 1980 SIC. The figures for September 1981 are on both bases.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Community Radio

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications his Department has received for licences to operate community radio stations; if he will break down this figure by region; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many representations he has received about the licensing of community radio since the answer of 6 June to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) Official Report, column 215; how many of these have related to the timing of his decisions on the developments of community radio; and if he is yet in a position to indicate precisely when these decisions will be announced.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Applications for community radio licences have not yet been invited, although interested groups have on occasion forwarded details of their programming and other plans. Since 6 June, we have received about 90 letters and telephone calls about community radio; a small number of these inquired about the timing of a further statement on the development of community radio. In this latter connection, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 July.

Metropolitan Police (Plastic Handcuffs)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why plastic handcuffs have been introduced by the Metropolitan police;

(2) what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the use of plastic handcuffs conforms with the guidance in the Metropolitan police instruction book.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that plastic handcuffs have been the subject of evaluation trials but have not been issued for normal policing duties. A limited number are available, however, for use by officers on special duties, under the direction of senior officers.

Metropolitan Police (Fire Resistant Overalls)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fire resistant overalls the Metropolitan police possess; and how many have identity numbers attached.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that his force has about 6,500 pairs of fire resistant overalls and that instructions have been issued that officers must display identity numerals when wearing overalls on duty.

Public Entertainment Licences

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to amend the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982, section 1 and schedule 1 (Licensing of Public Entertainments) to provide that licences attach to the premises and are not personal to the particular applicant; and if he will make a statement on the implications of the present statutory provisions for the enforcement of safety regulations.

Mr. Mellor: Under section 1 of and schedule 1 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982, a public entertainment licence is granted to a particular person but in respect of particular premises. It is essential that the licence should be granted to an individual so that he can be held responsible for ensuring that the requirements of the licence (including those relating to safety) are complied with. If he fails to comply, he renders himself liable to criminal proceedings and the licence itself may also be revoked. My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to amend the legislation, nor are we aware that it has led to difficulties of enforcement of safety regulations

Greater Manchester (Community Relations)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester on the use of special branch officers of the Greater Manchester police to take part in community relations activities; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are to replace the police national computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question of 14 November 1984 at column 258.

Criminal Information System

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will place the operational specification of the proposed criminal information system for the Metropolitan police in the Library.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis whether to proceed to detailed design work on a computerised crime reporting system. The Commissioner informs me that, primarily for reasons of security, he does not intend to make the operational specification widely available. He does not consider, therefore, that it would be right to place it in the Library.

Proxy Votes

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there is an expiry date for proxy votes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In general, a person appointed to vote as proxy on an elector's behalf is entitled to vote at any parliamentary, European Parliament or local government election so long as the elector is entitled to be treated as an absent voter. If my hon. Friend has a particular difficulty in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Unemployed Offenders

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of new offenders are unemployed.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Sentencing Policy (Manslaughter)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will commission a study on the implications for penal policy and deterrence of a statutory minimum penalty, subject to reduction only in exceptional circumstances, for the crime of manslaughter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The argument against statutory minimum penalties is that they would unduly constrain the court's ability to take the circumstances of the offence and the offender fully into account in passing sentence. This applies with particular force to the offence of manslaughter, which varies greatly in degree of seriousness. The courts already have the benefit of full guidance in judgments of the Court of Appeal on sentencing in cases of manslaughter. We do not therefore believe that a study would be worthwhile.

Defendants (Non-appearance)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners remanded in custody in England and Wales were not produced at courts where they were due to appear as defendants for each day in May and June.

Mr. Mellor: The information is not available centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Medical Treatment)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the criteria for determining whether prisoners should be released from (a) open prisons and (b) closed prisons for medical treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Prisoners requiring medical treatment that cannot be provided within the prison system are sent outside for it. Security arrangements are decided case by case. Prisoners from open prisons do not usually require extensive security arrangements and they are frequently sent to outside hospitals even though appropriate treatment is available elsewhere in the prison system.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were released from (a) open prisons and (b) closed prisons for medical treatment during each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The approximate number of occasions on which prisoners were treated in outside hospitals was as follows. The figures do not distinguish between open and closed prisons.

Year	*In Patient Treatments	Out Patient Treatments
1980	1,400	14,500
1981	1,400	15,500
1982	1,500	16,300
1983	1,650	17,700
1984†	2,300	21,500

Asylum

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers who entered the United Kingdom in another category have been treated as illegal entrants in each year since 1979 and the current year to date; what was their nationality; and how many were detained on these grounds.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances he declares asylum seekers to be illegal entrants; at what stage in the asylum procedure this is done; and under what circumstances detention would be considered.

Mr. Waddington: If a person who may be an illegal entrant applies for asylum, his application is considered in accordance with normal asylum procedures. Only if his application is unsuccessful is consideration given to the possibility of his removal as an illegal entrant. Detention is then authorised only where this is considered necessary to effect removal.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what circumstances he will provide written reasons for refusal of asylum where there is no right of appeal and where no Member of Parliament is involved.

Mr. Waddington: Apart from the brief reasons given, for example, in the notice of refusal of leave to enter where a passenger seeks asylum on arrival in this country, it is not the practice to give detailed written reasons in these circumstances.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what circumstances travel documents will be offered to those people refused asylum but granted exceptional leave to remain.

Mr. Waddington: In general, if it can be shown that their own national authorities refuse to document them or that it would be unreasonable to expect them to approach their national authorities.

Iranian Nationals (Deportation)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iranians expressing a fear of returning to Iran have been refused permission to stay in the United Kingdom and subsequently deported to Iran in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. For the total number of Iranians who have been deported since 1979, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Battesea (Mr. Dubs) on 2 May 1985 at columns 216-18.

Metropolitan Police (Wrongful Acts)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the amounts paid in out-of-court settlements of claims arising from the wrongful acts of Metropolitan police officers in 1984; what were the amounts paid under awards made by courts in similar cases in 1984; and what was the number of cases initiated in 1984 and the number concluded in 1984.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the amounts paid in out-of-court settlements of claims arising from the wrongful acts of Metropolitan police officers in 1984, the amounts paid under awards made by courts in similar cases in 1984, the number of cases initiated in 1984 and the number concluded in that year.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The total amount paid in 1984 by the Metropolitan police in settlement of claims arising from allegations of misconduct by police officers—whether or not formal proceedings were instituted—was £162,986. The total amount paid by the force under awards made by the courts in similar cases during 1984 was £15,617. The number of such civil actions initiated against the force in 1984 was 181, and the number disposed of was 107.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown by district of the civil cases initiated by members of the public against the wrongful acts of police officers in the Metropolitan police for 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A breakdown by police district of the 181 such cases initiated in 1984 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Immigration

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many non-British citizens resident in the United Kingdom have submitted applications during the past six years for their spouses to be granted permanent settlement in the United Kingdom; and what proportion of such applications were successful and unsuccessful, respectively.

Mr. Waddington: Comprehensive information is not collected centrally on the citizenship of the spouses of those applying for entry clearance to or settlement in the United Kingdom. However, the following information is readily available. Over the period 1980 to 1984 about 100 husbands were refused entry clearance in the Indian sub-continent to join their wives in the United Kingdom solely or partly because they were not British citizens and in 1984 about 70 husbands from all countries were refused permission to extend their stay in the United Kingdom solely or partly for the same reason. The numbers of wives settled on removal of time limit at the same time as their husbands, all of whom will have been non-British citizens, were given for the years 1978 to 1984 in table 14 of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom 1984" (Cmnd. 9544).

Mr. Kandiah Raveenthiran

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received the report of the investigation he ordered into the removal to Sri Lanka of Mr. Kandiah Raveenthiran on 4 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Yes. I have received a full report about the circumstances in which Mr. Raveenthiran was returned to Colombo before the receipt of representations from the United Kingdom immigration advisory service against the decision not to grant asylum. This serious error occurred because not all those who ought to have been told of the setting of the directions for Mr. Raveenthiran's removal were told.

The Tamil emergency placed considerable strain on staff both in the immigration service and in other parts of the immigration and nationality department, but the report shows that there were a number of general weaknesses in communication and organisation which should not have been present. As a result, clearer lines of communication —particularly between headquarters departments and the ports—will be introduced and relative responsibilities more clearly defined.

In view of the pressures placed on staff, and the more general weaknesses to which I have referred, formal disciplinary action against individual officers involved would be inappropriate. Those involved have, however, been seen by the head of the immigration and nationality department and the ways in which they failed in their responsibilities have been made clear to them.

ENVIRONMENT

Defective Houses

Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will name the building societies in the Birmingham area known to be willing to lend on the security of houses designated under the Defective Housing Act 1984 after the houses have been repaired under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. Gow: In my reply of 7 May, at column 300, to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), I explained that the Building Societies Association had participated in the setting up of the arrangements for the NHBC warranty scheme for repairs to PRC houses and that I am confident that houses repaired under the NHBC scheme will prove acceptable to building societies generally.

Sir Reginald Eyre asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses under the Housing Defects Act 1984 have been repaired to fitness standards; and if he will set out the number and type in each category.

Mr. Gow: Under the Housing Defects Act 1984 local authorities provide grant assistance to private owners of houses designated under the Act towards the cost of reinstating those houses satisfactorily. I regret that information on the number of houses which have been reinstated is not available at present.

Construction

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the percentage of gross domestic product spent on construction in the following countries: (a) Canada, (b) West Germany, (c) France and (d) Sweden; and what is the equivalent figure for the United Kingdom.

Sir George Young: The available information for these countries relates to fixed capital investment only and excludes repair and maintenance work which is substantial in the United Kingdom.

Fixed Investment in Construction as a Percentage of GDP in 1982

	Percentage
Canada	13·5
Federal Republic of Germany	12·7
France	10·3
Sweden	10·9
United Kingdom	9·0

Although countries attempt to conform to common definitions, this is not always possible because of the differing information systems within each country.

Bungalows for Disabled People

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many bungalows for disabled people have been built since 1979; and how many were built between 1974 and 1979.

Sir George Young: From January 1980 to March 1985, completions were reported of 19,600 dwellings provided for the chronically sick and disabled by local authorities, new towns and housing associations in England, compared with 15,900 from January 1974 to December 1979. The type of dwelling is not reported.

Dieldrin

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those rivers which exceed the levels permitted under European Community directive 80/778/EEC for Dieldrin residues in waters intended for human consumption.

Mr. Macfarlane: The standards laid down in European Community directive 80/778/EEC relate to drinking water and are not meant to be applied to river waters. There is, as yet, no Community agreed river water quality standard for Dieldrin in the series of daughter directives arising from the directive 76/464/EEC on pollution caused by certain dangerous substances discharged into the aquatic environment of the Community.

Homeless People

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the number of homeless people in Portsmouth in each half-year since 1979.

Sir George Young: The following table gives the number of households accepted as homeless by Portsmouth local authority in each half-year since 1979.

	Number
1979 1st half	75
2nd half	65
1980 1st half	54
2nd half	60
1981 1st half	77
2nd half	71
1982 1st half	65
2nd half	56
1983 1st half	36
2nd half	49
1984 1st half	44
2nd half	109

These figures need to be increased by about 40 per cent. to allow for those households who, although considered to be homeless, received advice and assistance only.

My Department does not collect information on the size of these households.

London (Grants)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many consent applications citing clause 92 of the Local Government Bill have been received from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority;

(2) how many consent applications citing clause 93 of the Local Government Bill have been received from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is set out in the following table:—

Applications received under clause 92 of the Local Government Bill and section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 as amended by clause 93 of the Local Government Bill

Authority	Clause 92	Section 9/Clause 93
Greater London Council	193	521 (264)
Inner London Education Authority	1	28 (17)
Greater Manchester Council	90	208 (169)
Merseyside County Council	18	83 (59)
South Yorkshire County Council	71	236 (209)

Authority	Clause 92	Section 9/Clause 93
Tyne and Wear County Council	9	105 (78)
West Midlands County Council	99	264 (210)
West Yorkshire County Council	1	95 (60)

Note: Figures in brackets represent the number of applications received where the amount involved was below £250,000 in relation to building or engineering works and below £100,000 in relation to other categories detailed in section 9(1) of the Act.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about delays in granting consent for applications received under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Each application must be considered carefully and on its individual merits. If unnecessary delays are to be avoided, it is imperative that fully documented applications are submitted at the earliest possible stage.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has consulted any claimants' organisations about the Greater London council consent application under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for Searchlight took over three months to be granted; and whether he has personally visited the organisation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on Wednesday 10 July.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he or his officials have visited Spare Rib the London Lesbian and Gay Centre or the Women's Peace Bus since the Greater London council applied for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act to make a grant to the three organisations.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why consent for the Greater London council claimants festival has not been forthcoming;

(2) why consent to the All London Teachers Against Racism and Facism is being delayed.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Responses are awaited to requests made to the GLC for further information needed to enable proper consideration to be given to these applications.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations received in support of the Greater London council application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for the London Lesbian and Gay Centre, Spare Rib and Women's Peace Bus.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Thirty two letters have been received in support of the Greater London council's application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for the London Lesbian and Gay Centre, four letters in support of the application for Spare Rib and five letters in support of the application for the Women's Peace Bus.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why consent has not been forthcoming to the Greater London council's anti-racism awareness campaign; and whether he has consulted the Council for Racial Equality about his decision.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A response is awaited to a request made to the GLC for further information needed to enable proper consideration to be given to this application.

My right hon. Friend has not consulted the Council for Racial Equality with regard to this matter.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all outstanding applications for consent received from the Greater London council and the dates they were received.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications for the Greater London council and each of the metropolitan county councils under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act were for a value of less than £100, between £100 and £1,000, between £1,000 and £10,000, between £10,000 and £100,000, between £100,000 and £1 million and over £1 million.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Financial considerations are not always a material factor in determining applications under the Act and such details have not been supplied or sought in every case. The information requested is as follows:

Authority	Number of applications by value (£)
	Not supplied	Under 100	100-999	1,000-9,999	10,000-99,999	100,000-1 million	Over 1 million
Greater London Council	390	213	258	809	514	68	5
Greater Manchester Council	40	110	118	216	137	9	0
Inner London Education Authority	180	527	0	0	0	0	0
Merseyside County Council	60	48	39	61	10	6	0
South Yorkshire County Council	108	117	75	140	43	2	0
Tyne and Wear County Council	5	39	41	101	30	2	0
West Midlands County Council	36	122	64	227	134	7	1
West Yorkshire County Council	65	43	35	75	39	4	0
All Authorities	884	1,219	630	1,629	907	98	6

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when a further series of general consents will be issued under sections 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act, and clauses 92 and 93 of the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A further series of general consents under sections 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act and statements of intention to consent under clauses 92 and 93 of the Local Government Bill were issued on 11 June. Further consents will be issued in due course, as appropriate.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act are still being considered by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Three hundred and sixty-one.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many press and public relations officers are employed in his Department; and what is the figure for each of the past three years and the total cost for each of those years.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The number and estimated staff costs of Government information officers employed by my Department over the last three years is:

Number (at 1 April)	Estimated costs (at outturn prices) £000's
1983 *25	0·346
1984 22	0·326
1985 23	0·338

*Staffing levels adjusted to reflect the transfer of officers dealing with transport matters to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many press notices have been issued by his Department in each of the past three years; and what was the total cost.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: In 1982, 1983 and 1984 my Department issued respectively 520, 608 and 592 press notices at a total cost of £50,395, a sum which includes all staff costs and a share of departmental overheads.

Housing Stock

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to make additional resources available to housing authorities to enable their housing stock to be brought up to higher standards following the meeting with the director general of the National Economic Development Council.

Sir George Young: One of the main conclusions reached in the NEDC's report was that better information was needed on the condition of the infrastructure. My Department has recently undertaken an inquiry into the condition of local authority housing stock. The results are now being analysed and will be taken into account in deciding the future levels of resources needed for public sector investment in housing.

2 Home Road, Battersea

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Greater London council can expect to receive written consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for the disposal of 2, Home Road, Battersea.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Written consent was issued on 11 September 1984.

Pesticides

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what samples of potable waters have been taken from the River Avon near Evesham for analysis; and what are the levels of Dieldrin, DDT and DDE found in the samples taken.

Mr. Macfarlane: The River Avon near Evesham is not used as a source of potable water and accordingly no samples have been taken for such usage.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Relief

Mrs. Beckett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the costs per year of tax relief for those who take out private insurance policies in substitution for the state earnings-related pension scheme when the state earnings-related pension scheme is phased out.

Mr. Moore: It is provisionally estimated that the proposals could reduce tax revenues by some £300 million per annum in 1989-90.

Labour Costs

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the increase in United Kingdom unit labour costs relative to the world generally and the EEC in particular; and to what extent this is used by Her Majesty's Government as an indicator of changes in competitiveness.

Mr. Peter Rees: Estimates of United Kingdom relative unit labour costs are available in the International Monetary Fund's publication "International Financial Statistics" (p64 in the July 1985 issue). The equivalent figures for relative unit labour costs vis-a-vis our EC partners on the same basis are given in the following table. Figures for the first half of 1985 are not yet available.

United Kingdom Unit Labour Costs Compared to the EC

	Per cent
1975	86·1
1976	71·2
1977	66·25
1978	71·0
1979	81·8
1980	100·0
1981	109·2
1982	104·6
1983	96·5
1984	99·8

Notes:
1. Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands.
2. Competitors costs are trade weighted expressed and in a common currency.
3. Some data is taken from OECD. Economic Outlook June 1985.

A variety of price and cost-based measures of competitiveness are monitored. Other aspects of competitiveness, such as quality, design and delivery dates are important but are not readily quantifiable.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the average variability of sterling against exchange rate mechanism currencies since the establishment of the European monetary system in terms of the real exchange rate measured in (a) consumer prices and (b) relative export prices.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The data necessary to calculate real sterling exchange rates and their variability can be found as follows:

(a) nominal sterling exchange rates against all currencies in the exchange rate mechanism are published in Financial Statistics, table 13.1;

(b) consumer price and export unit value indices are published in the country tables of the IMF's International Financial Statistics.

There are many alternative measures of exchange rate variability, and they can give widely varying results. Different measures will be appropriate in different circumstances.

Taxation Yield

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the annual yield produced by value-added tax in England and Wales for 1983-84.

Mr. Hayhoe: Net receipts of VAT in 1983-84 were £15,218 million, of which it is estimated that some £13,500 million was raised on expenditure in England and Wales.

Direct Cosmetics Ltd. (Judgment)

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on his policy regarding the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in the case of Direct Cosmetics Ltd. and the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Mr. Hayhoe: As I indicated to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe on 8 May (Official Report, column 402), a formal submission was made to the European Commission seeking to restore the VAT valuation provisions which the European Court of Justice judgment rendered ultra vires. The submission succeeded and the powers were restored on 12 June. New directions have been issued by Customs which took effect on 1 July. Claims have been invited from traders who consider that they may have overpaid tax.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the percentage level of value added tax take-up for each EEC country necessitated by the 1986 draft EEC budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The preliminary draft budget has not yet been published by the Commission, so it is not expected that the Council of Ministers will be in a position to establish a draft budget until September.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the percentage level of value added tax take-up for the United Kingdom for each EEC budget since 1975.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the maximum level of expenditure in the EEC budget implied by a 1·4 per cent. value added tax ceiling; and if he will list any similar estimates made by other EEC countries or the EEC Commission.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mines and Oil Wells Allowances

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now publish his proposals for changes to the mines and oil wells allowances.

Mr. Moore: A consultative document containing these proposals is being published today, and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. The document proposes changes on both the structure and rates of the mines and oil wells allowances. The effect of the proposals is to bring these allowances more closely into line with the general system of capital allowances, following the changes in the 1984 Finance Act and the provisions of this year's Finance Bill. The aim is to simplify and clarify another complex area of the tax system. The main proposals consistent with the wider capital allowances code are:

The abolition of the present system of allowances (initial allowances and writing down allowances based on output and royalty value of output formulae).

Their replacement by straightforward percentage based annual writing down allowances on a reducing balance basis. The proposed rate is 25 per cent. for qualifying expenditure other than that on the acquisition of minerals or rights over them for which a 10 per cent rate is proposed.

Relief to start when the expenditure is incurred provided that a mining trade has begun.

The abolition of relief for expenditure on land.

It is proposed that legislation on these proposals should be introduced in next year's Finance Bill. The consultative document invites representations on the proposals in the document and these should be sent to the Inland Revenue by the end of October of this year. An Inland Revenue press release issued today gives further details, including the price and the availability of the document.

Black Economy

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will initiate studies of recent estimates of the size of the black economy and the correlation between the level of unemployed claimants and registrants at jobcentres, with a view to instituting subsequently an inquiry into the size of the black economy and ways to restrict it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985]: Methods for dealing with the black economy are kept under constant review. In this connection, outside studies and estimates of the problem are carefully noted.

PRIME MINISTER

Lewisham

Q14. Mr. Moynihan asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Lewisham.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Treaty of European Union

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the preparations being made for the special meeting of the Council of Ministers to discuss the draft Treaty of European Union; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Preparations for the proposed intergovernmental conference called under article 236 of the EC treaty will be discussed at the Foreign Affairs Council on 22 and 23 July.

Japanese Trading Policy

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister what progress is being made with representations to Japan on its international trading policy.

The Prime Minister: In addition to direct representations to Japanese authorities by Ministers, the European Council in Milan endorsed the declaration by the Foreign Affairs Council on 19 June. This calls for Japan to make a clearly verifiable commitment to a significant, sustained increase in imports of manufactures and processed agricultural products, to further liberalise her financial markets and to internationalise the yen. The President of the Commission, M. Delors, will be meeting Prime Minister Nakasone on 19 July and will stress that the Community will judge Japan's response by the actual results of the action programme to be announced this month.

Economic and Industrial Policies

Mr. Dykes asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry and other Departments of State on the forward development of Her Majesty's Government's economic and industrial policies.

The Prime Minister: There is always room for improvement.

Soft Loans

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will increase the level of the present aid and trade provision in support of the proposed mechanism for soft loans.

The Prime Minister: The future level of ATP will be decided in the light of overall decisions on public expenditure and other claims on resources.

Cabotage

Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister, in view of the European Council's decision that priority should be given to creating a free market for transport, when the other European Community countries will extend to British-registered ships the rights of cabotage.

The Prime Minister: The EC Commission has proposed a 10-year transitional period for the opening up of cabotage trades as between member states. This is a far longer period than is necessary or than we can accept and the Secretary of State for Transport is having discussions with Ministers from other member states with a view to securing much earlier access for British vessels to those trades that are still closed.

Non-life Insurance

Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister, further to the statement on 2 July on the meeting of the European Council at Milan, whether any agreement was reached about when a free market in non-life insurance will be established throughout the Community.

The Prime Minister: The European Council agreed that the removal of barriers in financial services should be a high priority in the action programme for completing the Community internal market by 1992. Non-life insurance services are an important element in the Commission's paper on which the action programme is to be based.

France (British Visitors)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister if she will make representations to the French Government about incidents of ill-treatment of non-white British passport holders by French border officials.

The Prime Minister: We have already drawn the French authorities' attention to the concern felt here over the incident involving a British delegation to the Council of Europe Youth Week in Strasbourg, in which a Jamaican national was primarily involved. The French authorities are looking into the matter. I am not aware of any other recent incidents of this kind.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Philippine Airlines (Aircraft Purchases)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many British-made aircraft have been exported to Phillipine Airlines since 1970.

Mr. Channon: According to information that I have, British-made aircraft exported to Philippine Airlines since 1970 comprise five new and 11 used aircraft, three of which were purchased from United Kingdom operators; additionally, a further three aircraft have been leased from a United Kingdom airline. Five European Airbuses purchased in this period, in which Britain has a stake, have not been included.

Unit Labour Costs

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect the increase in relative unit labour costs since 1978 has had on the relative profitability of manufactured exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Manufacturers' relative unit labour costs affect their ability to compete in both home and overseas markets, while the relative profitability of exports may influence the balance they choose between export and home sales. The two are not therefore directly related, although they both have implications for the level of export sales.

Confectionery (Plastic Toys)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, in the light of the death of Roddy Breslin in Tyrone county hospital on 6 May, he will introduce legislation to prohibit the import and sale of chocolate eggs and other confectionery containing small plastic toys.

Mr. Fletcher: While saddened to learn of the death of Roddy Breslin through choking on the plastic wheels and axle of a toy car, I have to recognise, as parents do, that the world is full of small objects which can cause the death of a child by choking.

In the case of small toys and toys containing small parts the consumer safety unit advises the use of warnings to keep the objects away from small children, and many responsibile suppliers follow this practice. I have no plans to prohibit the supply of such products.

The Food Imitations (Safety) Regulations 1985 make illegal from 1 August 1985, small toys and some other objects which imitate food in appearance, taste or smell. But it would not be fair or practicable to extend this concept to small objects associated with food, such as cake decorations or novelties contained within chocolate eggs. Such products should carry warning labels and parents should be particularly vigilant.

Commodities (Investor Protection)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he made prior to formulating his investor protection policy as it relates to the users of (a) commodity markets in general and (b) to the terminal coffee market of the costs likely to arise to the markets and the implications for their international competitiveness; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The proposals for investor protection, described in the White paper "Financial Services in the United Kingdom" (Cmnd. 9432), are designed to promote the efficiency and competitiveness of the financial services sector, within a regulatory framework which inspires confidence in investors. These objectives apply to the regulation of business in all investments, which will include coffee and other commodity futures. Costs will be minimised because the system of self regulation within a statutory framework will allow the detailed rules to take account of the differing needs of the various types of investment and of the interests of investors and traders.

Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to progress in establishing the Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers; and what role he envisages for this body, in the context of his investor protection policy, in relation to the regulation of the terminal coffee market.

Mr. Fletcher: I welcome the progress made in establishing the Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers, which I hope will become operational as soon as possible. The White Paper, "Financial Services in the United Kingdom" envisages that recognised self-regulatory organisations will have a major role in regulating investment business under the proposed new regulatory regime. The AFBD will be eligible for recognition if its rules and practices provide an adequate level of investor protection.

British Telecom

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer of 27 June, Official Report, column 443, how many shares Rudolf Wolff & Co. undertook to buy in its role as underwriters to the flotation of British Telecommunications; and what happened to the shares they handled.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 6]: Rudolf Wolff was allocated 1·375 million shares under the placing and commitment arrangements described in my answer of 27 June. The arrangements for the offer for sale did not require applicants to give an account of their management of their allocations.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer of 27 June, Official Report, column 443, when the applications by employees of an eligible fund based overseas for 31,900 British Telecommunications shares were discovered; what arrangements were made for the surrender of their profits to charity; which charities were involved and on what dates payments were made to them; if any investigations into possible fraud or deception were carried out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 6]: The employees referred to in my answer of 27 June openly submitted their names to the overseas office of one of the brokers involved in the British Telecom flotation, in the belief that they were eligible for the placing and commitment arrangements. The London office of that broking firm made placing and commitment applications on their behalf in view of the limited time available. All brokers to the BT issue were required to give undertakings to our merchant bank advisers that applicants introduced under the placing and commitment arrangements were institutions of a certain size and the broking firm involved now accepts that it was in error in allowing these particular applications to go forward without checking whether the employees were buying on their own behalf or as trustees of funds. Before giving my answer of 27 June I asked for the placing and commitment allocation to be re-checked. The employees names came to light and the broking firm which had submitted the applications was asked to confirm the basis on which they had been made. When it became clear to the employees concerned that they had applied erroneously under the placing and commitments arrangements, they volunteered to surrender the profits earned to the Marine Adventure Sailing Trust. These payments were made on or around 25 June. All commissions that were earned in respect of these applications have been returned. I have no reason for believing that this was other than a genuine and honest mistake on the part of the brokers and the applicants concerned.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Indonesia

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to reduce the level of overseas aid to Indonesia.

Mr. Raison: We have no plans to reduce the level of aid to Indonesia. We plan a modest increase in the technical co-operation programme; and we announced in June a new loan commitment of £10 million.

Tigre (Famine Relief)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement outlining what action has been taken to provide relief for famine victims in Tigre; and if Her Majesty's Government in co-operation with other EEC countries and United Nations agencies are making a commitment to provide long-term development aid.

Mr. Raison: The Government have provided substantial relief, both directly and through voluntary agencies and the European Community, to victims of the famine in Ethiopia wherever they may be. For the longer term, we look mainly to the European Community and the World Bank, to which we make substantial contributions, to provide development assistance to Ethiopia.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to improve the quality of pianos in schools in St. Helena; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The St. Helena Government are likely to ask for new pianos when the education system is reorganised following construction of the new central secondary school. In the meantime, we are considering with the St. Helena Government what might be done to improve the present provision.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many independent sources of information he relies on in assessing present numbers of wirebirds in St. Helena and their general health as a species.

Mr. Renton: In addition to the published sources given in my answer of 10 December 1984, at columns 340-42, the agriculture and forestry officer of the St. Helena Government and the few amateur ornithologists on the island are available for consultation.

Mr. Oscar Mpetha

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the South African Government about the imprisonment of Mr. Oscar Mpetha; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Given Mr. Mpetha's age and physical condition there are strong humanitarian grounds for intervention. My right hon. and learned Friend therefore instructed Her Majesty's embassy in South Africa on 10 June to convey a request to the authorities that clemency be exercised.

I very much hope that our representations will be heeded.

Deputy Prime Minister of Jordan (Deputation)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from Her Majesty's ambassadors in Rome and Paris about the visits to those countries and also to the Holy See of the deputation headed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Jordan; and what information he has regarding the composition of the deputation.

Mr. Luce: A delegation led by the Deputy Prime Minister of Jordan visited Paris, Rome and the Holy See in late June and early July. It comprised the Deputy Prime Minister of Jordan; the Foreign Minister of Jordan; Mr. Jawid Al Ghoussein, chairman of the Palestine National Fund and a member of the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organisation; and Mr. Khalid Al Hassan, a former member of the PLO executive committee. The delegation was received by the Italian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister on 26 June, by the French Foreign Minister on 27 June and by the Pope and the Vatican Secretary of State on 1 July.

Mr. Elias Freij

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the recent visit to the United Kingdom by the Mayor of Bethlehem, Mr. Elias Freij and his meetings with Ministers; and whether he extended a welcome to Mr. Freij personally to participate in a joint Jordanian-Palestinian deputation organised by King Hussein.

Mr. Luce: Mr. Elias Freij, Mayor of Bethlehem, visited the United Kingdom as our guest from 20 to 25 June. We value continuing contacts with leading personalities from the occupied territories. He called on my right hon. and learned Freind and I on 24 June. We had a useful discussion on the situation in the occupied territories and developments relating to the Arab-Israel dispute. The possibility of Mr. Freij's participation in a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation was not raised.

Jordanian-Palestinian Delegation

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any members of the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation which was received by the Italian and French Governments in June whom Her Majesty's Government would not be prepared to receive (a) at ministerial and (b) at official level as members of such a delegation visiting the United Kingdom.

Mr. Luce: Our policy is to encourage all committed to working for peace. We maintain close and friendly contacts with the Jordanian Government. Our policy towards the PLO is well known. We look to the PLO to acknowledge Israel's right to exist and renounce violence.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if either Mr. Khalid Al-Hassan or Mr. Jawid Al-Ghussyn, executive members of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, have applied for a visa to visit the United Kingdom in the near future.

Mr. Renton: We have no trace of current visa applications from these two men.

Parades (Northern Ireland)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which foreign countries have made representations about the possible re-routeing of parades which would normally take place in Northern Ireland during June, July and August; and what response he has made to such representations.

Mr. Renton: The Irish Government made representations about the routeing of marches in Portadown in connection with a St. Patrick's day parade. But we have received no recent representations. We have always made it clear to the Irish that the re-routeing of parades is a matter for the police.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which foreign countries have made represenations about the possible banning of parades which would normally take place in Northern Ireland during June, July and August; and what response he has made to such representations.

Mr. Renton: None.

Nuclear Test Ban

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent initiatives Her Majesty's Government have taken at the Geneva conference on disarmament over a comprehensive nuclear test ban.

Mr. Luce: On 11 July the British delegation to the conference tabled a working paper on "Seismic Monitoring for a Comprehensive Test Ban", a copy of which will be placed in the Library shortly. The paper describes techniques for detecting and identifying seismic signals emitted by nuclear explosions, and relates these issues to the verification of a total ban on such explosions. We trust this working paper will make a helpful contribution to discussion within the conference on disarmament of unresolved technical issues which stand in the way of progress towards a verifiable comprehensive test ban.

Ocean Drilling Programme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the United Kingdom contribution to the ocean drilling programme in each of the past three years; if he intends that the United Kingdom should remain a full member of the programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The total United Kingdom contribution was as follows:

£000's

	NERC	Department of Energy	Total
1982-83	1,517·4	107·4	1,624·8
1983-84	382·0	—	382·0
1984-85	169·9	—	169·9

These figures relate to the international phase of ocean drilling, which was completed in September 1983, and to the ocean drilling project which began in October 1983. The project's financial years do not coincide with United Kingdom financial years, to which the figures shown here relate. On the second and third parts of the question I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 8 July 1985 at column 352.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether a decision has been made for British participation in the ocean drilling project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 8 July 1985 at column 352.

Business Schools

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to seek to transfer the funding of the United Kingdom's business schools from the University Grants Committee to his Department.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Joint Oceanographic Institutions for Deep Earth Sampling

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow on 8 July, what response the Natural Environment Research Council has had from companies in the oil and mining sectors to its request for contributions to enable the United Kingdom to afford the cost of full membership of the Joint Oceanographic Institutions for Deep Earth Sampling from 1 October 1985.

Mr. Brooke: I understand from the Natural Environment Research Council that the companies concerned have promised contributions totalling approximately £275,000 per annum for up to four years. Negotiations are continuing to see if this total can be increased.

Unemployed Persons

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with progress on the three-year Replan programme to widen education opportunities for the unemployed.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Replan programme, announced in March 1984, aims to encourage the development of suitable educational opportunities for unemployed adults in England and Wales by evaluating innovative provision, identifying and disseminating good practice, and promoting collaboration between relevant agencies, statutory and voluntary. Some 60 development projects have been approved for funding; regional staff development programmes involving some 2,000 participants have taken place; and education support grants have been offered to over 50 local education authorities in England and Wales for projects due to commence in 1985-86 and concerned with the planning, co-ordination and development of provision for the unemployed. I am satisfied with the start which the programme has made.

A central role is being played by a team of field officers which is now complete, the majority of its members having been in post since January.

Primary and Secondary School Pupils

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate how many (a) primary and (b) secondary pupils are being taught in temporary accommodation at the latest available date.

Mr. Dunn: The information needed to provide estimates in the form requested by the hon. Member is not available. However, the current best available estimate is that in January 1985 there were 450,000 temporary places in primary schools and 370,000 temporary places in secondary schools maintained in use by local education authorities.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many primary school pupils currently attend schools in buildings constructed before (a) 1920, and (b) 1940.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not held centrally.

Teachers

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers have left their jobs in the last eight months.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not yet available centrally.

Education Statistics

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide figures for every third year since 1961-62, showing the number and the proportion (a) of all students entering higher education who are of working-class families and (b) of all school leavers who are of working-class families.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers and proportions of home university students with known social class accepted through the Universities Central Council on Admissions (UCCA), and who were from social groups IV and V for every third year since 1977 were as follows:

Year	Number	Percentage
1977	4,200	6·4
1980	3,900	5·4
1983	4,400	7·1

Similar figures are not available for earlier years, nor for students in public sector higher education, nor for school leavers.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has been asked for advice by any local education authorities retaining selection as to the effects of falling rolls upon their grammar schools.

Mr. Dunn: No.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department as to the effect of falling rolls on the academic and selective nature of grammar schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Reports by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools are the main source of evidence available nationally of the effects of falling rolls on all types of secondary schools, including grammar schools. These report, inter alia, on observed changes in the curricular and ability ranges of schools with declining pupil numbers. Information provided by local education authorities and others in respect of proposals published under sections 12 to 15 of the Education Act 1980 provides further evidence in respect of particular schools.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the proposals relating to the minimum size of schools, contained in the White Paper, "Better Schools", did not refer to grammar schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The principles proposed in the White Paper are in respect of the most common forms of school organisation. However, its statement that each school should as far as possible be kept large enough to justify sufficient teachers to provide all pupils with a curriculum which measures up to the principles set out in chapter 2 is of general force.

Pupil Achievement

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department as to the influence of family poverty on participation in and achievement at school; and whether he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: On 14 November 1984, at columns 698-99, I told the House about two studies undertaken by the Department which examined the statistical association between achievements of pupils in maintained schools and various social background and other factors. These factors included the proportions of children in families of lower social and economic status, of children in families on supplementary benefits, in large families, in single-parent families and in poor housing. The first of the studies (reported in Statistical Bulletin 13/84) found a strong association between low achievement (the proportion of pupils failing to obtain any graded results in O-levels and CSE) and the poverty-related factors of poor housing, single-parent families and a low proportion of children in higher socio-economic groups. This outcome was not inconsistent with the results of the second study. I also pointed to wide variations in examination results among pupils from similar socio-economic backgrounds. A better understanding of the factors giving rise to this wide variation is likely to be relevant to the development of the Government's policies for improving standards in schools for all pupils. I have said that I am willing to consider proposals for research in this area.

Remedial Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the amount spent on remedial education by each local education authority in 1979-80 and 1984-85 in real terms; what proportion of the education budget each figure represents; and what percentage change was involved in each case.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not available: remedial education is not separately identified in the local education authorities' returns of expenditure.

Education Budget

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the total education budget in real terms and in cash terms (a) including that amount representing teachers' pay and (b) excluding that amount representing teachers' pay (i) in 1984-85 and (ii) in each of the next three years; and whether he will state the proportion of the education budget represented by teachers' pay in each case.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information including teachers' pay is as follows:

Education Provision	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million
Cash	13,310	13,725	13,630	13,630
Real Terms 1984-85 base	13,316	13,066	*12,240	*12,002

* Real terms based on total cash figures including provisional plans for local authority current expenditure, subject to review.

Notes:

(1) within these totals:

central Government expenditure:
1984-85: provisional outturn (Cmnd. 9569)
1985-86/1987-88: Cmnd. 9428 plans

local authority current expenditure
1984-85: provisional outturn
1985-86: local authority budgets
1986-87/1987-88: Cmnd. 9428 provisional plans, subject to review.

The figures for 1985-86 onwards the figures do not include funds transferred to MSC of funds for "Training for Jobs." The sums involved are £62 million in 1985-86, £105 million in 1986-87 and an equivalent sum in 1987-88.

(2) Cash figures adjusted for general inflation as measured by GDP deflator at market prices.

No specific proportion of the planned provision for 1985-86 onwards is attributable to teachers pay; it is not therefore possible to show the figures excluding it nor to state the proportion of the education budget which it represents. It is for local authorities as employers to accommodate the pay of teachers in schools and further education within the total cash provision, having regard to other claims. Outturn figures for local authority expenditure for 1984-85 (including expenditure of teachers' pay) are not yet available. In 1983-84, the latest year for which actual expenditure is available, local education authorities spent £5·9 billion on teachers' salaries in schools and further education out of a total of £8·35 billion net institutional expenditure.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of gross national product has been spent on the education budget in each year since 1979; and what are the projected figures for each of the next three years in each case (a) including pay and (b) excluding pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is more realistic to express such expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product (GDP). The figures are as shown. For 1985-86 onwards the GDP figures used are the projections shown in the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1985-86.

Financial year	Education budget as proportion of GDP*†
1979-80	4·2
1980-81	4·4
1981-82	4·4
1982-83	4·3
1983-84	4·2
1984-85	4·1
1985-86	3·9
1986-87	13·5
1987-88	13·4

* Education expenditure for which the holder of my office is responsible, ie, on universities in Great Britain, mandatory awards in England and Wales, local authority sector expenditure in England and other central Government expenditure almost entirely in England. Gross domestic product for the United Kingdom.

† Education budget totals made up from:

central Government expenditure:

1984-85 : provisional outturn (Cmnd. 9569)

1985-86 : Cmnd. 9428 plans.

1987-88

local authority current expenditure

1984-85 : provisional outturn

1985-86 : local authority budgets

1986-87 : Cmnd. 9428 provisional plans.

1987-88

For 1985-86 onwards the figures do not include funds transferred to MSC for "Training for Jobs".

‡ Education budget includes Government's provisional plans for local authority current expenditure in 1986-87 and 1987-88. These plans remain subject to review.

Information is not collected in a form which would allow the figures for past years to be shown excluding pay for all employees whose salaries are met from the education budget. For 1985-86 onwards, no specific proportion of planned provision for local authorities is attributable to pay; it is for local authorities as employers to accommodate it within total cash provision. Within planned provision the total for central Government expenditure for 1985-86 is consistent with the Government's assumption of pay increases of 3 per cent. for those groups for which it is responsible.

School Activities

Mr. Proud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will take steps to collect information as to the number and proportion of children who do not take part in the following activities, where they form part of the standard school day, in those local education authorities which levy charges for the activities (a) music, (b) swimming, (c) other sports and (d) domestic science; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to collect information about the practice of local education authorities as to the levying of charges for the following subjects where they form part of the school day (a) music, (b) swimming, (c) other sports and (d) domestic science; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: There are no plans to collect information in the form suggested. Section 61(1) of the Education Act 1944 prohibits the charging of fees in respect of the education provided in any maintained school, and we have made it clear that we look to local education authorities to ensure that this statutory requirement is met. We have also made it clear that we recognise that many parents are ready to make voluntary contributions to their children's schools, and that such generosity is to be welcomed provided that the contributions are genuinely voluntary and that no child is penalised because his parents are unwilling or unable to make such contributions.

Mrs. H. Fusco (Appeal)

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be able to announce his decision in respect of the appeal by Mrs. H. Fusco of Wentworth Drive, Perton, under section 8(6) of the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: It has been necessary to make further inquiries of the Staffordshire local education authority concerning the special educational provision it has proposed to make for Mrs. Fusco's son. My right hon. Friend expects to be able to reach an early decision on the appeal when the required information has been received.

Overseas Students (Spain and Portugal)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether students from Spain and Portugal will become entitled to pay fees at the home student rate on the accession of those countries to the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Students from Spain and Portugal in the United Kingdom who satisfy the necessary conditions will become entitled to pay the same rate of fee as "home" students following the accession of those countries to the European Community on 1 January 1986. My right hon. Friend proposes that the following arrangements should apply.

From 1 January 1986 nationals of Spain and Portugal who are students in the United Kingdom will be entitled to pay fees at the same rate as "home" students provided that they satisfy the conditions for residence in the European Community prior to the start of the course laid down in the Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1983 (SI 1983/973 as amended by SI 1984/1201) and the Education (Fees and Awards) (Scotland) Regulations 1983 (SI 1983/1215 as amended by SI 1984/1361). These regulations will be amended to provide that residence in Spain or Portugal before the accession of those countries to the Community will be treated as residence in the Community for the purposes of the regulations. This amendment will apply not only to nationals of Spain and Portugal, but also to nationals of all other Community countries, including the United Kingdom. Nationals of the United Kingdom resident in Spain and Portugal who might not otherwise be entitled to pay the home rate of fee will therefore be treated on the same basis as nationals of those countries.

The date of accession falls one third of the way through the academic year 1985-86. For that year students from Spain and Portugal who satisfy the necessary conditions will be expected to pay an annual fee composed of one third of the relevant "overseas" rate and two thirds of the relevant "home" rate. Local authorities, universities and other institutions of further and higher education should be guided accordingly.

The necessary amendments to the relevant regulations will be laid before Parliament as soon as possible.

Secondary Schools (Articles of Government)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local education authorities since November 1982 have sought his permission to change their articles of government for secondary schools; which of these authorities were given permission; which were denied permission; and, in each case, what were the reasons for the refusal.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 382]: The information requested is as follows:

Approved
- Barnet
- Bexley
- Birmingham
- Cornwall
- Durham
- Humberside
- Knowsley
- Leeds
- Stockport
- Surrey
- Wakefield

Not Approved
- Bolton

- Sheffield
- Staffordshire
- Suffolk
- Sunderland

Under Consideration
- Barnsley
- Bedfordshire
- Bromley
- Liverpool
- Newham
- Nottinghamshire

The proposals not approved were incompatible with the Government's policies on school government and, in particular, either purported to give powers to the local education authority to override actions properly taken by the governors and headteacher under other provisions of the articles or otherwise sought to confer too great powers on the local education authority at the expense of the governing body.

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the fare structure for civilians on flights to the Falkland Islands following the opening of Mount Pleasant airport.

Mr. Stanley: A new fare structure for civilian travel on Ministry of Defence flights between the United Kingdom and Mount Pleasant airport, via Ascension Island, came into operation on 1 July. This new structure is described in a paper "Fare structure for air movement between United Kingdom and the Falkland Islands", copies of which I am sending to my hon. Friend and am placing in the Library.

Caribbean

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence which ports received naval visits by Her Majesty's ships within the Caribbean area for each year since 1983.

Mr. Stanley: The number of visits by Her Majesty's ships within the Caribbean area for each year since 1983 was as follows:

* Up to 6 July.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many and which class of ship and submarine visited ports in the area of the Caribbean, including Belize, in each year since 1982.

Mr. Stanley: The number of Royal Navy vessels, by class, including Royal Fleet Auxiliaries, which have visited ports in the Caribbean area was as follows, for each year since 1982:

Classes of ship	1982	1983	1984	1985*

Shackleton Aircraft

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Shackleton force will remain operational until Nimrod AEW enters service.

Mr. Stanley: I can confirm that it is our intention to maintain the Shackleton in service until Nimrod AEW enters service. To this end, a programme of major servicing for the Shackleton will start later this year.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has had any discussions with the United States Government on the possible role of Ascension Island in the strategic defence initiative research programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No such discussions have taken place.

Service Land

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the Royal Navy and other branches of the armed services have to release land to the public, including local authorities, in the Portsmouth area.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to my recent reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) on 21 June, at columns 248-49.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many hectares of land are owned by the Royal Navy in Portsmouth, Fareham and Gosport local authority districts.

Mr. Lee: The following areas of land in the local authority districts requested are in the ownership of the Secretary of State for Defence, and occupied by the Royal Navy:

	Hectares
Portsmouth	279·0
Fareham	92·5
Gosport	777·0

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the report into the future of the housing requirement of the Royal Navy in the Portsmouth area will be published.

Mr. Lee: There is no such report.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion, and in which local authority districts, of the land owned by the Royal Navy in the Portsmouth naval base area is redundant.

Mr. Lee: At present some 0·8 per cent. of the naval estate in the local authority districts of Portsmouth, Fareham and Gosport is surplus to requirements and in the process of disposal. We have proposals to declare other areas surplus over the next few years following studies into the further concentration of the naval estate in the Portsmouth area.

TRANSPORT

Roads

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the stage which has been reached in the statutory and non-statutory procedures for each of the trunk road schemes listed in the 1987 to 1989 time band of the document "National Roads—England 1985".

Mrs. Chalker: Responsibility for preparation of the 107 schemes in this two-year period is divided between nine regional offices. I regret therefore that the information requested cannot be provided without disproportionate cost. If the hon. Member is interested in a particular scheme, perhaps he would care to write to me.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent by his Department in each of the last 12 years at constant prices on (a) maintenance and repair of motorways and trunk roads and (b) new building of motorways and trunk roads.

Mr. Ridley: The figures are as follows:

£ million

	Maintenance and repairs	New building
1973-74	199	926
1974-75	112	753
1975-76	130	797
1976-77	132	740
1977-78	121	526
1978-79	141	452
1979-80	142	425
1980-81	131	400
1981-82	192	443
1982-83	204	529
1983-84	184	501
1984-85 (1982-83 prices)	*212	*532

* (provisional)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the amount spent by local authorities in each of the last 12 years on (a) maintenance and repair of roads and (b) new road building, expressed at constant prices.

Mr. Ridley: I shall reply to the hon. Lady very shortly.

Ironbridge Bypass

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Transport in what way the compulsory purchase order for the Ironbridge bypass, which was withdrawn, was defective.

Mrs. Chalker: The compulsory purchase order made by the county council for the Ironbridge bypass on 30 July 1984 which was withdrawn, was defective because it lacked an adequate statement of purposes. A new compulsory purchase order was made on 5 June 1985.

Taxis (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications for taxi services in Liverpool of the proposals on taxi licensing contained in the Transport Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: District councils in England and Wales which license taxis under the Town Police Clauses Act 1847 have adopted widely varying policies, and some have limited numbers more severely than have others, such as Liverpool city council. What is now clause 16 of the Transport Bill will prevent any district council from refusing a licence unless they are satisfied that to grant it would have an adverse effect on the general availability of taxis or the cost of providing taxi services. The effect of this in a particular area will depend upon local circumstances.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from taxi operators in Liverpool about the proposals on taxi licensing contained in the Transport Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Liverpool Taxi Owners Association made a representation seeking no change from the present policies under the Town Police Clauses Act 1847.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the most recent comparative evaluation carried out by his Department into the high pressure sodium lamps and low pressure sodium lamps for motorway lighting purposes; and if he will set out the results showing lamplife, energy consumption, light output and installation cost.

Mrs. Chalker: A comparative evaluation was completed in June and the data used included:

	*Low pressure sodium	*High pressure sodium
Bulk lamp change after	8,000 burning hours	12,000 burning hours
Electricity supply cost per year per lantern	£29	£40
Installation cost for lantern, control gear and 1st lamp	£110	£70
Lamp cost	£19	£10

* Light output assumed to be about 26,000 lumens in both cases.

The conclusion was that the whole life costs were finely balanced over the life of the lantern and on that basis the low pressure sodium type should be favoured as it uses much less energy. In view of this conclusion consideration is being given to requiring evaluations to be done on a scheme by scheme basis, using tender costs, to ensure that value for money is always obtained.

Bus Industry

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many jobs were lost in the bus industry from December 1980 to December 1982.

Mr. David Mitchell: The number of staff employed by bus and coach operators in Great Britain fell by 13,560 in this period, reflecting the decline in the level of local bus services.

Bus Lanes

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of bus lanes in London.

Mrs. Chalker: Bus lanes can provide a benefit to the community when correctly designed and in the right circumstances. Equally, when badly designed and installed in the wrong place they can cause problems.

Roads (Telephones)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy regarding the installation of telephones on high class all-purpose roads at the construction stage.

Mr. Ridley: It is not my policy to provide telephones on trunk roads since help in an emergency is usually close by. Public telephones are provided by British Telecom where they believe they may be commercially justified. Telephones may be provided by the motoring organisations in safe locations.

Signposting

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy with reference to sign posting of primary and secondary destinations on the M1 motorway between London and Wakefield.

Mr. Ridley: On the M1, as on other motorways, signs normally show only primary destinations, but a destination of secondary importance may be shown at a junction where there is no suitable primary destination in that direction. Wakefield itself is signed from junctions 39, 40 and 41 on the M1.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received recently from British Rail any plans to electrify the Portsmouth to Southampton line.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

Company Cars

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the number of company cars in 1960, 1970 and in each year since 1974; and what proportion this represented of the total number of cars in each year.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Lorry Bans

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the number of lorry bans applied by local authorities and the total number of miles of roads affected by such bans in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Lorry Construction

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the modifications to lorry construction affecting safety, scale and noise levels enforced by his Department in each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Ridley: The following are the main new requirements for lorry and trailer construction brought in by regulation over the period. Minor changes, those affecting special or rare types of lorry and provisions merely to allow Community standards as alternatives, are omitted.

Airline Passengers

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he can provide any information regarding the percentage of civil airline passengers using British airports travelling for leisure and the percentage travelling on business in 1964 and in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Ridley: Only information relating to international passengers is available:

* Leisure includes those travelling for the purpose of a holiday; visiting friends and relations; formal study; medical, religious or marriage reasons; taking up employment and seeking employment. The vast majority of leisure travellers are on holiday or are visiting friends and relations.

Buses

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of vehicle kilometres travelled by all buses, passenger transport executive buses, municipal buses, National Bus Company and Scottish Bus Group buses, and private buses, in 1964 and in each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is as follows. Figures for 1984 will be available later this year in "Transport Statistics Great Britain 1974-84" HMSO.

The ownership of a number of operators changed in the period to 1975. The figures for earlier years have been adjusted to conform to the present ownership categories. For example, the passenger transport executive figure for 1964 consists of the municipal and private operators which later formed the PTEs. The vehicles kms. of operators in 1964 as they then existed were:

	Million
Municipal Operators	562
Nationalised	592
Private	930

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were employed in bus services, municipal buses, National Bus Company, Scottish Bus Group, private buses and Passenger Transport Executive buses, in 1964 and in each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is as follows. Figures for 1984 will be available later this year in "Transport Statistics Great Britain 1974-1984" Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Airline Industry

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total contribution to the United Kingdom balance of payments from the airline industry in 1964 and in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Ridley: Following is the information:

Traffic Statistics

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a table, showing the estimates made in 1960 for traffic on (a) motorways and (b) trunk roads (distinguishing between car, light van, lorries under 28 tons and over 28 tons) in respect of the years (i) 1970, (ii) 1975, (iii) 1980, (iv) 1985, (v) 1990 and (vi) 2000; what were the actual outturn traffic levels for (1) 1970, (2) 1975 and (3) 1980; and what are the latest projections for 1985, 1990 and 2000, expressing those traffic levels in vehicle/kilometres, or some multiple thereof.

Mr. Ridley: Records are not held centrally of any estimates of future traffic made in 1960, and searching for them would incur disproportionate cost. Some forecasts of traffic were made in the early 1960s at the then Road Research Laboratory, but these were in the nature of research and not necessarily the policy of the then Ministry of Transport.

The Ministry's 1968 booklet "Advisory Manual on Traffic Prediction for Rural Roads" forecast traffic for all rural roads, and for all traffic, equated to passenger car units. From a 1960 base, it predicted these units to grow by 83 per cent. to 1970, 129 per cent. to 1975, 167 per cent. to 1980, 198 per cent. to 1985, 223 per cent. to 1990 and 265 per cent. to 2000.

The actual outturn traffic, in billion vehicle kilometres was as shown in the following table.

Vehicle type Year/Road class	Cars and taxis	Light goods vehicles	HGVs under 28 tonnes GVW	HGVs over 28 tonnes GVW	All HGVs
1970
Motorways	5·96	0·56	—	—	1·97
Trunk roads	25·61	2·84	—	—	5·58
1975
Motorways	14·02	1·30	2·28	1·42	3·70
Trunk roads	27·58	3·11	3·45	1·53	4·98
1980
Motorways	20·77	1·83	2·68	2·37	5·05
Trunk roads	32·90	3·34	3·15	1·83	4·98

Note: No breakdown of HGV's for the above categories is available for 1970.

Current national forecasts are for all categories of road together with no isolation of trunk roads and motorways. They were published, with the background underlying them, in the Department's national road traffic forecasts, 1984. They are shown in the following table, expressed in billion vehicle kilometres.

	1985		1990		2000
	Low	High	Low	High	Low	High
Cars and taxis	227	236	249	277	271	331
Light vans	22·3	22·8	23·3	24·6	25·0	29·4
Heavy goods vehicles
—under 25 tonnes GVW	13·3	13·7	13·0	14·0	12·3	14·2
—over 25 tonnes GVW	6·3	6·5	6·6	7·1	7·3	8·4

Notes:
GVW is gross vehicle weight.
The forecasts for heavy goods vehicles are broken at 25 tonnes GVW.

Airport Security

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Transport, further to his reply of 4 July to the hon. Member for Derby North, Official Report, column 220, whether he has yet come to any conclusions in his review of the security measures that apply to airports and airlines in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the security arrangements for passengers boarding aircraft of British airlines.

Mr. Ridley: At a meeting I held on 27 June with some of the major airlines and airports represented on the National Aviation Security Committee it was agreed that, although a high standard of security was achieved at British airports, there was scope for some enhancement of present arrangements. These matters have now been discussed further in the National Aviation Security Committee.

Security would not be served by my giving full details. However, we are revising our existing measures for the security of hold baggage; among other things we intend to recommend to airlines the need to end "off-airport" check-in except where security is adequately safeguarded. These measures will be given statutory backing if necessary. We are reviewing access control at airports, other aspects of the security of airport terminals, and the security of cargo, including the latest technology for screening and handling. We shall also be reinforcing our advice to British airlines about security arrangements at overseas airports.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Ethnic Minorities

12. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what ways the National Health Service takes account of the special health needs of ethnic minorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In developing their services, we expect individual health authorities to reflect the needs of the populations they serve, including any special needs of ethnic minorities. Centrally, we have supported the Stop Rickets campaign of 1981-83 and the current Asian Mother and Baby campaign.

Board and Lodging Benefits

15. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will withdraw the supplementary benefit regulations which deal with board and lodging; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: No. The changes were necessary to control escalating expenditure and to help curb abuse by both landlords and claimants.

39. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received since the introduction of the supplementary benefit regulations on board and lodging calling for an increase in the sums allowed.

Mr. Whitney: A detailed breakdown of the subject-matter of letters received from hon. Members and others on the new supplementary board and lodging changes is not available. However, since 29 April we have received about 650 letters from hon. Members and about 450 letters direct from individuals and organisations, many of which concerned the level of the board and lodging allowances.

Carers (Benefits)

16. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to introduce a carers' benefit.

Mr. Newton: Invalid care allowance is the benefit for carers of severely disabled people. We have no plans to introduce any other benefit of this nature.

NHS (Facilities)

17. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, since 1980 what has been the (a) net increase in new operating theatres, (b) net increase in new X-ray rooms, (c) net increase in new accident and emergency departments and (d) net increase in new outpatient departments in the National Health Service; and how this compares with the previous four-year period.

Mr. John Patten: In the five years 1980 to 1984, 35 major hospital schemes, each valued between £5 million and £20 million, have been completed and include 169 new operating theatres, 105 X-ray rooms, 23 accident and emergency departments and 22 outpatient departments.

New building schemes for the National Health Service are spread over the whole country and although some of them provide for new communities, most have replaced old and outdated facilities. Over 70 major schemes, each costing over £5 million and with a total value in excess of £840 million, are being planned, designed and constructed. This increased investment is bringing real improvements in terms of new hospital buildings as well as maintenance of existing stock.

Information on the content of new building schemes for the four-year period 1976-1979 is not available centrally.

Elderly Persons (Residential Care)

18. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what extra provision is to be made by his Department to meet the additional nursing charges incurred by certain elderly persons in residential care.

Mr. Whitney: From 29 April new limits were introduced for supplementary pensioners in residential care. The basic rate is now £110 a week with higher amounts available for those whose disability arose before pension age. A further £28·60 is given in recognition of the extra care provided by nursing homes.

"Reform of Social Security"

19. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many further representations he has received relating to the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security".

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) earlier today.

Abortion Act 1967

20. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to complete his investigation into alleged abuses of the Abortion Act 1967, details of which have been supplied to him by the hon. Member for Broxbourne.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are taking the follow-up action agreed when my hon. Friend and I discussed this matter on 27 June.

Housing Benefit

21. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has estimated the likely cost to local government if the Green Paper proposal, which increases the 10 per cent. of housing benefit met by local government to 20 per cent., is implemented.

Mr. Newton: The Green Paper proposes that the proportion of housing benefit costs not met by specific grant will be taken into account in rate support grant. The implications of this proposal will be discussed with the local authority interests.

Cigarette Companies (Sponsorship)

22. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his assessment of the effect of sponsorship of sports and other events by cigarette companies on the level of smoking.

Mr. John Patten: I know of no evidence that links sponsorship by cigarette companies in this country with the level of smoking.

Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital, Stanmore

23. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the report from the Le Quesne working party into the future of the royal national orthopaedic hospital, Stanmore, Middlesex.

Mr. John Patten: The working party on orthopaedic services in Bloomsbury, chaired by Professor Le Quesne, was set up by the health authority. The report will therefore be made to the authority, not to the Secretary of State. I understand the report will be ready by the end of July. If the report or subsequent consideration of it by the health authority recommends changes to the orthopaedic services in Bloomsbury, then there will be full consultation in the normal way. I have already said that if major changes are proposed in Stanmore then, even if proposals are unopposed by the Community Health Council, the matter will be referred to the Secretary of State before final decisions are taken. The report of the working party would clearly be one of the documents we would need to take into account at that stage if major changes are proposed.

Basingstoke and District Hospital

24. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future level of resources available to the Basingstoke and district hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We provide funds to the Wessex regional health authority and it allocates part of those funds to the Basingstoke and North Hampshire health authority to cover provision of all its services. The district health authority then decides on the level of resources for its individual units, according to national policy guidelines and its own judgment of local priorities. In the current year, we have allocated £504 million revenue expenditure to Wessex regional health authority which is an increase of 6·7 per cent. over its 1984-85 funding. To obtain details of the specific funding to Basingstoke and North Hampshire health authority, my hon. Friend may care to contact the chairman of Wessex regional health authority or, for details of allocations more locally, the chairman of Basingstoke health authority.

Small Businesses (Report)

25. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what specific measures he plans to undertake to ensure that his Department implements the proposals contained in the recent Department of Trade and Industry report on the scrutiny of administrative and legislative requirements in small businesses.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's response to these proposals will be set out in the Government's White Paper on deregulation which has been published today.

Health Authorities (Competitive Tendering)

26. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will report upon the latest progress of health authorities in submitting services to competitive tender.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) at columns 489-93 on 12 June.

NHS (Rayner Scrutinies)

27. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is in a position to estimate the savings achieved by the first group of Rayner type scrutinies in the National Health Service.

58. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress there has been towards realising all the savings identified in the first programme of scrutinies into different areas of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have given all health authorities advice and policy instructions on the implementation of scrutiny recommendations. We do not yet have the information requested but we have asked regional health authorities to report to us by the end of the year on the savings they have achieved.

Surrogate Children

28. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the number of surrogate children that have been born; whether they were born in National Health Service hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have complete and reliable information. As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend on 21 January, at column 354, hospitals could have considerable difficulty in distinguishing between surrogate mothers and other expectant mothers. As my hon. Friend knows, the Government's Bill to outlaw commercial surrogacy agencies has today received Royal Assent.

NHS Privatisation (Northern Region)

29. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the policy of privatisation in the northern region of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have made quite clear our policy on competitive tendering and this applies equally to the northern region as it does to the rest of the country.

Pharmacists (Contracts)

30. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the agreement achieved with the Pharmaceutical Services negotiating committee on the pharmacists' contract.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since our final offer on the new contract for community pharmacists was put to the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee on 14 May, I have had meetings with representatives of the Company Chemists Association, Boots and Underwoods Ltd. We have also received correspondence from Safeways Ltd., from Underwoods, and, either direct or via hon. Members, from 13 individual pharmacists.

These representatives are coming from a dissatisfied minority of contractors. The PSNC negotiates for all contractors and their negotiators, including representatives of the Company Chemists Association, accepted our proposals unanimously. The proposals were accepted by the local pharmaceutical committees at their conference on 23 June by a majority of 192 to 19.

Chronically Disabled People (Powered Wheelchairs)

31. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received regarding the provision of battery-powered wheelchairs for the chronically disabled.

Mr. Newton: In the past year we have received over 70 letters, including a petition with some 7,000 signatures, advocating the provision of powered outdoor wheelchairs in addition to those for indoor use already issued by the Department.

Severe Disablement Allowance

32. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will change the conditions for payment of severe disablement allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so.

Home Helps (Disabled People)

33. Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities charge disabled people in receipt of supplementary benefit for their home helps.

Mr. Newton: This information is not collected centrally.

50. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department has received with regard to the charging of disabled people on supplementary benefit for their home helps; what has been his response; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) on 1 April, at column 493, since when very few representations have been received about charging for home helps whether or not the people were disabled or in receipt of supplementary benefit. Our view remains as stated on many occasions that we would prefer those on supplementary benefit, whether disabled or otherwise, not to be charged.

Cardiac Operations

34. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent initiatives he has taken to encourage health authorities to increase their annual turnover of cardiac operations and to make improvements in intensive care facilities.

Mr. John Patten: In January 1984, we asked health authorities to develop coronary artery surgery as a priority within the acute sector and this was restated in January 1985. The number of coronary artery bypass operations perfomed within the United Kingdom rose from 3,538 in 1979 to 9,443 in 1983, an increase of 167 per cent. It is for health authorities to relate intensive care facilities to the workload.

Personal Social Services (Suffolk)

35. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the current level of expenditure on personal social services for the elderly in the Suffolk county council area.

Mr. John Patten: Expenditure returns from local authorities do not separtely identify the client group benefiting from each item of expenditure. Gross current expenditure by Suffolk county council in 1983-84 on services principally for the elderly is given in the table. Figures for later years are not yet available.

	£ million
Residential care for the elderly	6·9
Home helps	2·4
Meals in the home	0·1
Day centres and lunch clubs for the elderly	0·2

Low Income Families (Private Medical Care)

36. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to encourage low income families to opt out of the National Health Service in favour of private medical care.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

Sugar (Dental Health)

37. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the effect of sugar on teeth in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have recently received formal representations from a number of professional organisations involved in children's health expressing concern about the adverse effects of the long-term use of sugar-based medicines on the teeth of sick children. For further information on this issue I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) on 2 July at columns 125-26.

Cervical and Breast Cancer

38. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in drawing up proposals for improving screening techniques for cervical and breast cancer.

54. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress of his consideration of the possible extension of mammography in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On cervical cancer I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to my reply on 29 April, at columns 49-51, to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox). Since then consultations have begun with representatives of the medical profession on practical steps to improve the effectiveness of follow-up arrangements for abnormal results. I will also be meeting representatives of the British Society for Clinical Cytology in the near future to discuss the problems being experienced in some of the laboratories which process smears.

As I informed the House on 2 July, we have set up an expert working party on breast cancer screening. Its terms of reference are:

i. to consider the information now available on breast cancer screening by mammography; the extent to which this suggests necessary changes in United Kingdom policy on the provision of mammographic facilities and the screening of symptomless women; and

ii. to suggest a range of policy options and assess the benefits and costs associated with them; and set out the service planning, manpower, financial and other implications of implementing such options.

Its membership is:

Professor A. P. M. Forrest (Chairman) Regius Professor of Clinical Surgery at the University of Edinburgh;
Dr. J. Chamberlain, Institute of Cancer Research;
Mr. A. Elton, Northwick Park Hospital;
Dr. H. Gravell, Welsh National School of Medicine, Cardiff;
Dr. D. Hayes, Belfast City Hospital;
Professor C. Joslin, University of Leeds;
Ms. A. Ludbrook, Health Economics Research Unit, Aberdeen University.

In addition, the following have agreed to be co-opted to assist the chairman as and when their expertise is required.

Mrs. J. Andrews, (Radiographer)
Mr. M. Fitzgerald, (Physicist)
Mr. K. Ford, (District Treasurer)
Dr. D. J. Pereira Gray, (General Medical Practitioner)
Miss. P. Hibbs, (Nursing Officer)
Mr. R. Taylor, (District General Manager)
Dr. B. Thomas, (Mammography screener)
Dr. R. Wrighton, (District Medical Officer)

I have asked the Chairman to report as soon as possible.

Drug RU 486

40. Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the drug known as RU 486 has been examined by the Committee on Safety of Medicines; what study he has made of the extent of the use of the drug in the United Kingdom; how many representations he has received concerning the availability of the drug in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This drug is available only in relation to two clinical trials, for which the licensing authority has granted doctor's exemption certificates. One of the trials relates to use of the drug in abortion and involves a maximum of 20 patients. The doctor responsible for this clinical trial has confirmed that it will be conducted in accordance with the requirements of the Abortion Act. The Committee on Safety of Medicines, which advises the licensing authority, is not involved in the doctor's exemption scheme. We have received four letters about use of the drug in abortion.

Wrightington Hospital

41. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be in a position to make a statement on the future of the children's ward at Wrightington hospital.

Mr. John Patten: At this stage this is a matter for the health authority which, I understand, is about to undertake formal public consultations on its new proposals.

Board and Lodging Regulations

42. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to hold discussions with the Association of Directors of Social Services on the Government's recently introduced board and lodging regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to meet the Association of Directors of Social Services on this subject.

62. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many people under the age of 25 years have been required to move from one area to another as a consequence of the board and lodging regulations recently introduced by his Department.

Mr. Newton: Detailed information is not available on the total number of claimants whose period of payment as a boarder has been restricted since the introduction of supplemenary benefit board and lodging changes from 29 April. However, initial indications from various parts of the country suggest that most non-exempt claimants assessed on the new rules are receiving benefit as householders or non-householders in the same or different accommodation.

NHS (Expenditure)

43. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the gross domestic product was spent on the National Health Service in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the percentage in 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983, 5·6 per cent. of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product was spent on the National Health Service. In 1978 the figure was 4·8 per cent.

Bed and Breakfast (Supplementary Benefit)

44. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is now satisfied with the operation of his proposals to curb the abuses of supplementary benefit payments for bed and breakfast claimants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tony Newton: The information at present available suggests that, following the introduction of the new rules, the numbers receiving board and lodging payments have declined significantly, and that most of the claimants affected are now receiving benefit at the householder or non-householder rate. We shall continue carefully to monitor the arrangements, and be ready to extend the exemption categories if the need is shown.

Social Services Departments

45. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to seek to rationalise the work of social services departments.

Mr. John Patten: While it is primarily for local authorities, taking account of local circumstances and their own priorities, to determine how the work of their social services departments is carried out, we are always concerned to promote improvements in their professional practice, efficiency and effectiveness. The Audit Commission is helping that process with its studies on various aspects of the personal social services and the Department's new social services inspectorate aims to secure the most effective use of professional and other resources by identifying good practice and spreading knowledge about it.

Basildon

46. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total annual expenditure of his Department in the Basildon area.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available.

NHS Hospitals

47. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the latest approximate figures for the amount spent per year on window cleaning in National Health Service hospitals;

(2) what are the latest approximate figures for the amount spent per year on pest infestation control in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not separately identified in the accounts submitted to the Department by health authorities.

School Meals

48. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the proposals in the social security Green Paper in respect of school meals for children of families receiving the proposed family credit.

Mr. Whitney: We have received two representations asking that school meals, rather than a higher rate of benefit, should continue to be made available to children of those families receiving the proposed family credit. We have also received a number of inquiries about the details of our proposals.

Child Benefit

49. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many families have qualified in respect of one or more children for child benefit for children over the age of 16 years in the last year for which figures are available; and what are the estimates of numbers likely to qualify for each of the next five years.

Mr. Whitney: At 31 December 1983, about 913,000 families were receiving child benefit for at least one child aged 16 or over. The estimates for the subsequent five years are:

	Families
31 December 1984	870,000
31 December 1985	820,000
31 December 1986	790,000
31 December 1987	760,000
31 December 1988	720,000

Drug Prescriptions (Appeals)

51. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the latest position with regard to the appeals mechanism on which drugs can be prescribed on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) earlier today.

Girocheques

52. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his Department's Girocheques normally delivered on a Saturday in the Worksop area still frequently do not arrive until the following Monday.

Mr. Whitney: Until January this year there were recurrent problems with the delivery of unemployment or supplementary benefit girocheques posted from the computer centre at Reading to claimants in the Worksop area, but in January claims for that area were transferred to the computer centre at Livingston. We know that in March there were delays in delivery of two small batches of girocheques but we are not aware of there having been any general problems since the change of computer centre. If the hon. Member will let me have details of any specific complaints, I will look into them.

North West Thames Regional Health Authority

53. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he will make a statement on the percentage real increase in revenue expenditure of the North West Thames regional health authority between 1978-79 and 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There were significant boundary and management changes in 1982 which make it impossible to give a sensible figure for the whole period. However, on the pre-1982 boundaries between 1978-79 and 1981-82 the revenue expenditure of North West Thames regional health authority rose by 12·3 per cent. ahead of the general level of inflation. Between 1982-83 and 1984-85 it rose by 1·6 per cent. in the same real terms.

Breast Cancer

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the expert group to report on proposals to improve screening for breast cancer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have asked the chairman of the group to let me have a report as soon as possible. I announced the formation of the group on 2 July. The chairman will need time before he can make a realistic assessment of how long this task will take.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of women suffering from breast cancer in the years between 1979 and 1984 in the following age groups: 16 to 24 years and 24 years to 35 years.

Mr. John Patten: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys handles statistics of registrations of newly diagnosed cancers; this provides the nearest available information on the numbers of women suffering from breast cancer. The information in the exact age groups requested is available only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows the latest readily available figures.

Numbers of registrations of malignant neoplasm of female breast, ICD (9th Revision) 174, for selected age-groups, females only, 1979 to 1981

Year	Age-group in years 15-24	25-34
1979	15	471
1980	22	488
1981	16	483

War Pensioners

56. Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from organisations representing ex-service personnel on the effects on war pensioners of the proposal in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security", to withdraw local authority discretion to operate local schemes to enhance the amount of income disregarded for the purpose of calculating entitlement to housing benefit.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a letter from the Council of British Service and Ex-Service Organisations, which represents over 50 ex-service organisations. We have had no other representations.

Staff Retraining

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has for the retraining of staff in his Department in order to assist with the implementation of his social security reviews.

Mr. Newton: The type and extent of retraining which staff will need depends on the details of the new schemes to be implemented. Decisions will not be taken until after the consultation period ends.

Nurses (Stress)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will institute a departmental inquiry into the prevalence and causes of stress among nurses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. We do not consider that there is evidence which indicates that such an inquiry is justified. I am aware that the results of a survey by the Nursing Mirror purport to demonstrate that a majority of nurses suffer high levels of stress. However, I understand that the survey represents the views of a self-selected sample of only 1,000 nursing staff (out of a total nursing staff of 400,000 in England) who completed a questionnaire published in the Nursing Mirror at a time when we were awaiting the review bodies' recommendations on their pay. We cannot therefore accept that this is a representative and objective national picture.

Nursing is a demanding and sometimes stressful job, but nurses are trained to meet those demands. We have demonstrated the respect and high regard in which we hold the profession by our decisions on their pay and training. Between April 1979 and February 1986 nurses' basic pay rates will have risen on average by 111 per cent., which is over 30 per cent. ahead of the forecast rise in prices over the same period. We have reduced their working week without loss of pay from 40 to 37½ hours. Between September 1979 and September 1984 an extra 39,500 whole-time equivalents have been employed in England.

We have also set up the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting and the four national boards so that the nursing profession could become largely self-governing in determining future patterns of education and training. All these statutory bodies are collaborating on proposals for change. The English national board has already produced draft proposals. We have encouraged the board to consult the profession, and are ourselves consulting health authorities on these proposals which will reduce the ward responsibilities of student nurses and given them more theoretical work in their first two years of training. This is aimed, in part, at reducing the stress amongst beginners exposed too early to heavy responsibilities as well as improving the quality of service given to patients.

Aids and Adaptations

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy regarding the circumstances in which he exercises his default powers against a local authority which is delaying the provision of aids and adaptations under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Newton: Each case is considered on its merits. Where there is prima facie evidence that an authority may be in breach of its duty under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, inquiries are pursued and we then consider, in the light of those inquiries, whether there are grounds for making an order under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 declaring the authority to be in default.

Health Co-operation

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the co-operation between health authorities and the social services departments of county councils; and if he will make a statement about this in relation to community care.

Mr. John Patten: Good progress has been made in some places, but there is room for improved co-operation generally, particularly in the development of better co-ordinated community care services. We look forward to receiving shortly the report of an official level working group on joint planning set up jointly by the local authority associations, the National Association of Health Authorities and the Department to suggest ways of improving joint planning between health and local authorities and of securing the better use of resources.

Widows

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women claimed widows' allowance, broken down by age showing (a) the number who were aged less than 40 years, (b) the number who were aged 60 or more and (c) by single years the number who were aged between 40 and 59 years, or the nearest available information, and for the latest available year.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

SOCIAL SERVICES

Widows

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women stopped claiming widows' allowance and began to claim (a) age-related widows' pension, (b) widows' pension and (c) no widows' benefit, showing them in each case broken down by age into (i) those aged 60 years or more, (ii) by single years those aged 40 to 59 years or the closest available breakdown and (iii) those aged less than 40, for the latest available year.

Mr. Whitney: The available information is as follows:

Information about the number of widows in receipt of widow's allowance who have no entitlement to a succeeding widow's benefit is not available.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women stopped claiming widowed mothers' allowance and began to claim (a) age-related widows' pension, (b) widows' pension and (c) no widows' benefit, showing them in each case broken down by age into (i) those aged 60 years or more, (ii) by single years those aged 40 to 59 years or the closest available breakdown and (iii) those aged less than 40 years for the latest available year.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

* Including widowed mother's allowance (personal).

† Not applicable.

‡ No succeeding benefit available.

1. Terminations of widowed mother's allowance with no succeeding benefit for widows over 40 occur as a result of disqualification eg because of "living together".

2. This 12 month series is an aggregate of statistics from two six-monthly periods ended 31 March 1983 and 30 September 1983. The age of the widow is the age at the sample date, thus some of the widows from the March enquiry would be a year older than shown by 31 September 1983.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the total number of widows receiving widows' pension at the full rate, (b) receiving age-related widows' pension at each of the age-related rates, showing separately those with reduced pensions for contribution reasons but counting them as if they received benefit at the full rate at the latest available date.

Mr. Whitney: At 30 September 1983 177,320 widows were receiving widow's pension at the standard rate and 13,910 receiving a reduced rate on account of contribution deficiencies. From the available information on age-related widow's pension it is not possible to classify those widows whose age-related pension is reduced on account of contribution deficiencies according to their age. For example, a widow receiving a pension of 65 per cent. of the standard rate could be either a woman widowed at 45 whose late husband had a full contribution record or a woman widowed at a later age whose late husband's record was deficient. The number of widows receiving an age-related widow's pension at 30 September 1983 is as follows:

Widows receiving age-related widow's pension at rate appropriate to age

Age at widowhood or cessation of WMA*	Rate of pension (per cent.)	Number of widows
40	30	3,800
41	37	3,200

* Widowed Mother's Allowance

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate how many widows each year would (a) be denied age-related widows' pension altogether, (b) move across each of the age bands to the next lower rate, showing the movement across each age band separately and (c) get age-related widows' pension rather than full widows' pension; and what would be the total annual saving to public funds if the relevant date for determining entitlement to widows' pension or age-related widows' pension were brought forward from the date of expiry of entitlement to widows' allowance to the date of bereavement;

(2) if he will estimate how many new claimants each year would (a) be denied age-related widows' pension altogether, (b) get a lower age-related widows' pension, showing the movement from each age band separately and (c) get age-related widows' pension rather than full widow's pension, showing the movement into each age band separately; and what would be the annual saving to public funds if the age bands for entitlement to age-related widows' pensions were each raised by five years.

Mr. Newton: The relevant date for determining entitlement to widow's pension or age-related widow's pension is not the date of expiry of entitlement to widow's allowance but the date of bereavement, except in the case of a widow who has been receiving widowed mother's allowance for whom the relevant date is that on which her entitlement to widowed mother's allowance ceases. The table gives estimates of the number of new claimants each year who would be affected if the age bands for entitlement to age-related widow's pension were raised by five years.

The financial effects and numbers of widows affected by the raising of the age bands for age-related widow's pension by five years would build up over time, since pensions already in payment would not be affected. The financial effects of such a change would depend on what assumptions were made about benefit rates, and entitlements to income-tested benefits. However, we estimate that the combined effect on the national insurance fund of all the proposals for widows' benefits in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9517), including the raising of the age bands for widow's pension by five years, would be to increase expenditure from the fund by about £28 million in the first full year. In the second year the effect would be broadly neutral, and savings would build up after then with an approximate saving of £50 million by the fifth full year. These figures assume current benefit rates and that the new lump sum payment would be £1,000.

New Claimants who would be affected by the raising of the age bands for age-related widows pension from 40-50 to 45-55

(a) Number with no entitlement to age-related pension = 1,500

(b) Number who would get an age-related pension at a lower rate than now

Age 45 =	200
46 =	500
47 =	600
48 =	1,000
49 =	1,200
Total =	3,500

(c) Number who would get age-related pension rather than full widows pension

Age 50 =	1,600
51 =	1,500
52 =	2,300
53 =	2,500
54 =	3,100
Total =	11,000

Note to table:
Total numbers above are accurate only to nearest 500 except for those below 500 which are to the nearest 100. They are derived from 1983 estimates of the number of widows receiving widows benefits.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of (a) men and (b) women receiving board and lodging benefit in (i) the London borough of Wandsworth and (ii) Greater London.

Mr. Whitney: I regret the information requested is not available.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information was used to determine the weekly upper limits for ordinary board and lodging claims by couples without dependent children under the age of 11 years provided under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 369-371]: I regret that this question was included inadvertently with a number of statistical questions from the hon. Member for Derby South which I answered on 9 July. We considered the previous arrangement did not reflect actual cost and accordingly put forward a proposal in the consultative document referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee on 29 November 1984. In the light of the representations received and the committee's own views, we have no reason to believe that the limits now adopted for couples without a child under eleven are unreasonable.

Central Heating (Addition)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate how many people in the Newport, East constituency are likely to be affected by the proposal to abolish central heating additions for new claimants as from 5 August;

(2) how many people in the Newport, East constituency receive central heating additions at both the higher and lower rate; and if he will estimate the effect his recent review will have on these benefits.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the cost savings in respect of pensioners' central heating supplementary benefit payments as a result of the decision to make no further such awards from 5 August.

Mr. Whitney: We estimate the savings from the change in entitlement to central heating additions for pensioners to be about half a million pounds in 1985-86 rising to about £3 million in 1987-88.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any information on the likelihood of regular smokers contracting Legionnaire's disease.

Mr. John Patten: There is limited epidemiological evidence to suggest that cigarette smoking is one of the risk factors which can give rise to an increased possibility of developing the disease after exposure to the infection through the inhalation of polluted water droplets.

Family Credit

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the recently unemployed claiming family credit will have to wait 13 weeks before a payment can be made under the proposals in the Green Paper.

Mr. Newton: We have no intention of requiring the recently unemployed to wait 13 weeks before a claim to family credit can succeed and the new provisions and procedures will be designed accordingly.

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are planned under the family credit scheme to deal with (a) those who change jobs in the middle of a payment period, (b) those who move in and out of short-term jobs and (c) those who hold more than one part-time job.

Mr. Newton: These and other details of the proposed family credit scheme are being considered in the course of consultation on the Green Paper.

Social Fund

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements will be made for the repayment of a loan from the proposed social fund if the claimant ceases claiming benefit before the loan is repaid.

Mr. Newton: We shall consider the arrangements for the repayment of loans from the social fund, including cases where the recipient ceases to receive or does not receive benefit, in the light of our consultation on the social security green paper.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the numbers of women suffering from cervical cancer in the years between 1979 and 1984 in the following age groups: 16 to 24 years and 24 to 35 years.

Mr. John Patten: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys handles statistics of registrations of newly diagnosed cancers; this provides the nearest available information on the numbers of women suffering from cervical cancer. The information in the exact age groups requested is available only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows the latest readily available figures.

Numbers of registrations of malignant neoplasm of cervix uteri, ICD (9th Revision) 180 for selected age-groups, females only, 1979 to 1981

Hospitals (Infections)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence he has regarding the spread of hospital-induced infections by the transmission of pathogenic organisms by pests.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no evidence to suggest this is a significant factor.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many of the 77 serious outbreaks of hospital infection reported to the public health laboratory service in the last five years the source of the infection was established; in how many of the hospitals there was evidence of pest infestation; and in what proportion of cases this was considered to have contributed to or cause the outbreak.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have information in the form requested.

Hospitals (Pest Infestation)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice his Department offers to hospitals regarding control of pest infestation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We provide an advisory service on pest control to the National Health Service. Health authorities were notified of this service in HN(76)186. We encourage each district to have at least one officer trained in basic pest control procedures and to meet this aim our Department organises one week residential courses in pest control management. Since 1977 we have run 24 such courses each with an average attendance of 20.

We have also issued two advice notes on the subject:

1. Domestic Service Advice Note No. 5—'An Introduction to Pest Control in Hospitals' (2nd Edition, 1984).
2. Domestic Service Advice Note No. 6—'Pest Control—Contract Management' (1981).

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest figure for the proportion of National Health Service hospitals which have infestations of (a) pharoah's ants and (b) other pests; and from what source the figure is derived.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest information available on the incidence of pharoah's ants in National Health Service hospitals in England indicated that 11·6 per cent. of hospitals surveyed were infested. These figures are taken from: Edwards J P and Baker L F, 1981: "Distribution and importance of the pharoah's ant monomorium pharonis (L) in National Health Service Hospitals in England", Journal of Hospital Infection 2, 249-254. We have no information on the prevalence of other pest species in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions environmental health officers have referred to pest infestation in their reports on hygiene in hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect centrally the information requested.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the British Pest Control Association regarding pest infestation hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the pests which are known to have infested National Health Service hospitals, indicating the extent of the incidence of the infestations and their seriousness in terms of patients' health.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At one time or another National Health Service hospitals are known to have suffered from the following pests: rats, mice, feral cats, sparrows, pigeons and various species of ants, cockroaches, and other insects. I am sure an equally impressive list could be compiled by any other large organisation responsible for residential buildings if it was asked a similar open question without limits of time and I hope the right hon. Member will not derive alarmist conclusions from it. We do not keep a central record of the extent and incidence of infestations by pests, but health authorities must take all possible measures to minimise the effects of pest infestation on patients' health.

Royal Devon and Exeter Hospital, Wonford

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what additional funding he envisages that his Department will make available to finance the replacement of the Royal Devon and Exeter hospital, Wonford, in the light of dangers arising from aggregate reaction.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The South Western regional health authority and Exeter health authority are urgently considering what needs to be done to replace the parts of the hospital that are unsound and to ensure the safety of the building in the meantime. They are also considering the legal position. We have asked the regional health authority to report on their plans and on the financial implications of these by February 1986. We will not be able to make any firm decision on funding until we have seen this report.

NHS (Cost)

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give, in round figures, the annual cost of the National Health Service for each of the last five years, specifying for each year the amount spent on administrative, clinical and auxiliary services, respectively, and the percentage figures each represents of the whole;

(2) if he will give, in round figures, the annual cost of the National Health Service for each of the past five years, specifying the numbers employed and the total wage bill in respect of each year, giving the wage bill as a percentage of the total annual cost;

(3) if he will give, in round figures, the total annual cost of the National Health Service for each of the past five years, broken down into regions and districts, respectively; and what is the percentage figure each represents of the whole.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Staff)

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the numbers of staff employed at his departmental headquarters with direct responsibility for the National Health Service for a convenient date in each of the past five years.

Mr. John Patten: The number of staff employed in the Department's headquarters with direct responsibility for the National Health Service on 1 April for each year since 1981 was as follows:

Date	DHSS (HQ) Staff-in-post with direct responsibility for the National Health Service Number
1 April 1981	907
1 April 1982	870
1 April 1983	837
1 April 1984	790

Chronically Sick and Disabled People (Newcastle upon Tyne)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to the recently published report of the major survey of chronically sick and disabled people in the city of Newcastle upon Tyne, about which the Minister for the disabled attended a conference presided over by the lord mayor of the city on 9 July; if he will be drawing the report to the attention of other local and health authorities; and if he will make a statement on the report's findings.

Mr. Newton: I was pleased to attend the conference at which results of this survey were publicised. It is an example of the kind of co-operation between health and local authorities we have always encouraged. Information about the numbers and needs of disabled people is clearly of great importance, and this major study should be of interest to other health and local authorities. I am therefore ensuring that a reference to it is included in the Department's health and social service abstracts which are sent to all health and local authorities.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people between the ages of 12 and 21 years died from drug abuse in the years 1979 to 1985; and if he will provide a breakdown by region.

Mr. John Patten: Information in the exact form requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows the latest readily available figures.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people between the ages of 12 and 21 years died from alcohol abuse in the years 1979 to 1985; and if he will provide a breakdown by region.

Mr. John Patten: Information in the exact form requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows the latest readily available information for deaths specifically associated with alcohol. Limited additional information is given for deaths which may be associated with alcohol consumption. Deaths from road traffic accidents are not shown, but it is estimated that for all ages about one road death in five (i.e. about 1,000 a year in England and Wales) occurs in accidents where at least one person had consumed alcohol over the legal limit. Other than deaths due to toxic effect of alcohol, figures are not readily available for accidental deaths with any mention of alcohol on the death certificate.

Solvent Abuse

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people between the ages of 12 and 21 years died from solvent abuse in the years 1979 to 1985; and if he will provide a breakdown by region.

Mr. John Patten: Exact figures of deaths associated with solvent abuse are not available. However, the table shows the number of confirmed cases in England and Wales, by region, from the "National Study of Deaths Associated with the Abuse of Volatile Substances for 1979 to 1984" (the latest available year). One death in 1984 which is at present an unconfirmed case is not included in the figures.

Deaths (Causes)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the main causes of deaths of people between the ages of 12 and 21 years for the years 1979 to 1985; and if he will provide a breakdown by region.

Mr. John Patten: Information in the exact form requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the table shows the latest readily available figures. Broad groups of causes have been selected in order to give an overall view of mortality in this age-group. Different categorisation of causes could change the order of presentation.

Diet-related Disease

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to the incidence of diet-related disease in Britain and in other industrial nations; what is the trend in such incidence; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what is the cost of treating diet-related disease in the latest year for which figures are available; and what is the trend of the cost.

Mr. John Patten: I am advised that the part played by diet in the causation of disease, other than deficiency disease, has not been established with sufficient certainty to enable the information requested to be provided.

Tooth Decay

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information is available to his Department as to the incidence of tooth decay in school-age children in Britain as compared with other industrial countries; what is the trend in incidence; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what he estimates to be the cost of treating tooth decay in school-age children in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Pensions (Credit Transfer)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make an estimate of the possible cash savings to his Department that would be achieved in a full year on the assumption that pensions were paid by automated credit transfer to those pensioners who on the latest information available to him have a bank account.

Mr. Whitney: On the information available such a change could produce a saving of some £70 million a year. But so large a shift in the method of payment would involve such fundamental changes to the system that it is not possible to make a realistic estimate of the actual financial effects.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the procedure for filling generalist trade union places on district health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There are no places on district health authorities specifically reserved for trade unionists as such. In appointing generalist members, however, regional health authorities are statutorily required to consult a number of specified bodies which include trade union organisations. They are not required to appoint from among the names submitted in response to that consultation although we would normally expect each district health authority to contain one member with a background in the wider trade union movement.

Health Authority (South-East Staffordshire)

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each of the years 1978, 1982 and 1984 the number of doctors, nurses, ancillary and administrative staff employed by the South-East Staffordshire district health authority.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the amount spent on capital projects since 1979 by the South-East Staffordshire district health authority.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are required to submit capital schemes for departmental approval only if they cost more than £5 million. Detailed information on smaller capital schemes is not therefore held centrally and my hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairman of south east Staffordshire health authority for the figures requested.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the Northern Ireland Housing Executive takes to monitor the performance of its contractors; what sanction it applies in cases where a contractor fails to meet the required standards or fails to carry out the terms of his contract; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive who has informed me that there is a named supervisory officer for each contract. Standards of workmanship are set at the outset of a contract and the performance of contractors is assessed regularly. The Housing Executive also monitors its programme monthly in terms of progress of works and expenditure. Contractors failing to meet the standard or failing to carry out the terms of their contracts may be suspended or removed from the approved list of contractors and may face the termination of their contracts.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many single payments for funeral expenses under supplementary benefits regulations have been made in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year in Northern Ireland;

(2) how many single payments for maternity expenses under supplementary benefits regulations have been made in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, figures derived from the annual statistical inquiry show that the numbers of single payments made during the preceding 12 months to persons on supplementary benefit at the time of the inquiry were as follows:

	Numbers

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many single payments have been made under supplementary benefit regulations in each social security office in Northern Ireland in the first half of the current year.

Mr. Chris Patten: The numbers of single payments made under supplementary benefit legislation in each social security office in Northern Ireland during the period from 15 January 1985 to 4 June 1985 are as follows:

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total amount of money spent on single payments made under supplementary benefits in each of the past six years and the first half of the current year by each social security office in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is given in the table:

‡ To 4 June 1985.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many urgent needs payments under supplementary benefit regulations have been made in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year by each social security office in Northern Ireland; and what was the total amount of money so paid by each office in each year.

Mr. Chris Patten: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many single payments have been made under supplementary benefit regulations for furniture and household equipment in each social security office in Northern Ireland in the first half of the current year and in each of the past five years; and what was the total amount so paid in each office in each year;

(2) how many single payments have been made under supplementary benefit regulations for clothing and footwear in each social security office in Northern Ireland in the first half of the current year and each of the past five years; and what was the total amount so paid in each office in each year.

Mr. Chris Patten: I regret that the information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what figures are available to indicate the numbers of supplementary benefit claimants in Northern Ireland who receive additional requirement payments for some heating costs;

(2) what figures are available to indicate the numbers of supplementary benefit claimants in Northern Ireland who receive additional requirement payments for excessive laundry costs;

(3) what figures are available to indicate the number of supplementary benefit claimants in Northern Ireland who receive additional requirement payments for extra dietary costs;

(4) what figures are available to indicate the number of suplementary benefit claimants in Northern Ireland who receive additional requirement payments for special clothing and footwear or heavy wear and tear on clothing.

Mr. Chris Patten: At 7 December 1983, the latest date for which figures are available, the estimated numbers of supplemenary benefit recipients whose additional requirements included the cost of heating, laundry, diets, clothing and footwear were as follows:

	Number
Heating	104,300
Laundry	1,300
Diets	21,100
Clothing and footwear	350

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry.

The amounts payable for such requirements is reduced in certain long-term cases by £1 a week.

Social Security Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many appeals have been heard by each of the social security appeal tribunals in Northern Ireland and their predecessors over the past five and a half years; how many of these were upheld; and if there are figures to indicate how many such appeals and decisions related to eligibility for benefits, single payments, additional requirements, urgent needs payments, overpayments, conditions for payment of benefit, amount of benefit awarded, capability of employment or availability for employment.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the numbers of families in Northern Ireland who received family income supplement in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year.

Parades

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those parades in Northern Ireland which would normally take place during June, July and August 1985 which he has had brought to his notice as possibly leading to sectarian conflict.

Mr. Hurd: I exercised my statutory powers to prohibit the holding of parades in Castlewellan on 1 and 27 June 1985, following advice from the Chief Constable. It would not be right to disclose any details of confidential discussions about the possible effects of other parades.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list those parades which took place in Northern Ireland in the months of June, July and August 1984 in connection with which he took any action on the grounds that the parade as originally planned might encourage public disorder;

(2) if he will list those parades which took place in Northern Ireland in the months of June, July and August 1984 about which the police made representations to him seeking (a) bans and (b) re-routeings on the grounds of risk of public disorder; and what action he took in each case.

Mr. Hurd: The maintenance of public order and the routeing of public processions is a matter for the police. My right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney did not exercise the Secretary of State's powers to prohibit the holding of public processions in June, July or August 1984, and I understand that there were no recommendations from the police that such powers should be exercised.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current level of unemployment in Strabane; and what measures he proposes to take to seek to reduce it.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985]: The number of unemployed claimants in the Strabane district council area on 13 June 1985 was 3,871, giving an unemployment rate of 39·1 per cent. for the area.

The Government, through the Industrial Development Board and Local Enterprise Development Unit, will continue to direct resources to encourage the establishment of new industry, and to develop further those companies already in business so as to secure viable enterprises and long-term jobs. In recognition of the persistent severity of the unemployment problem in Strabane, the area has for some time now been able to offer the investor the highest rate of support available in the United Kingdom. The Department of Economic Development also provides a range of employment and training opportunities for both adults and young people. At present over 800 such places are available in the Strabane area.

Pensioners

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current number of pensioners in Northern Ireland by sex and by five-year age groups.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985]: The numbers of persons in Northern Ireland aged 60 who are in receipt of pensions or allowances, by sex and five-year age bands, where it is possible to provide the information in this form, are as follows:

Mr. Lawson: It is estimated that the total VAT revenue raised from sales of the record was of the order of three quarters of a million pounds.

Customs Officers (Drug Smuggling)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of customs officers who have been on duty at seaports and airports in each year since 1979 and the number of people who have been caught attempting to smuggle drugs into the United Kingdom at such ports in each single year during the same period.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise staff deployed on customs work at seaports, airports and inland premises throughout the United Kingdom for each year since 1979 are

	Number
1979	7,591
1980	7,231
1981	7,089
1982	6,861
1983	6,717
1984	6,553
1985	6,701

The number of people involved in offences against import prohibitions and restrictions on drugs for each year since 1979 are

	Number
1979	857
1980	1,017
1981	1,096
1982	1,207
1983	991
1984	1,256

Income Tax

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total number of persons who paid income tax in the latest available year in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Great Britain as a whole; and how many were aged 16 or 17 years at the time.

Mr. Moore: Provisional estimates of the numbers of income tax payers in 1985-86 by country are as follows:

	Taxpayers (thousands)
England	17,000
Wales	950
Scotland	1,700
Northern Ireland	430
United Kingdom	20,100

* Counting married couples as one.

I regret that information is not available to enable taxpayers aged 16 or 17 to be distinguished.

Customs Officers (Vacancies)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of posts for customs officers which are presently unoccupied; and at which ports these vacancies have yet to be filled.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is not possible without disproportionate cost to identify the number of individual posts for Customs Officer that have yet to be filled. At 1 July the total number of staff in the Customs and Excise Department was about 200 below the staff in post ceiling of 25,595.

Airports (Duty-free Facilities)

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is now able to make a statement about the revision of criteria for the granting of duty-free facilities at airports.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. Following a review by Customs and Excise, I have decided that the following criteria will apply. In order to qualify for a duty-free shop airports must:

(a) be designated;
(b) have scheduled flights or frequent charter services;
(c) have full-time attendance by Customs for flights to foreign and Channel Islands destinations.

Customs estimate that this could result in the granting of duty-free shop facilities at another eight regional airports.

Live Aid Concert (VAT)

Mr. Baldry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about value added tax treatment of the Live Aid concert at Wembley on 13 July.

Mr. Hayhoe: While the Government has not been able to accept suggestions that VAT collected on the ticket sales for charitable fund-raising events of this kind should be refunded, I can confirm that it has been possible to allow an exceptional waiver of VAT on four-fifths of the ticket proceeds, amounting to about £190,000. The promoters had intended to sell the tickets for £5, plus a voluntary donation of £20. To escape VAT, such a donation must be genuinely voluntary, and advertised as such. In this case the promoters made a mistake, and the £20 was not advertised as voluntary. VAT should therefore have been due on the full £25 admission charge. However, as a genuine mistake had been made, Customs and Excise, with the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, decided not to insist on the VAT on the donational element of the admission charge. This extra-statutory concession sets no precedent for the future treatment of events of this kind, which will have to comply with the normal rules for donations, that these must be in addition to a realistic admission charge, and be completely at the discretion of the purchaser of the ticket. These are clearly set out in the Customs and Excise VAT leaflet on charities, number 701/1/84.

VAT Ceiling

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the maximum level of expenditure in the EEC budget implied by a 1·4 per cent. value-added tax ceiling; and if he will list any similar estimates made by other EEC countries or the EEC Commission.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985]: We understand that for 1986 the Commission estimate that a 1·4 per cent. value-added tax ceiling would allow expenditure of about 35·8 billion ecu for the Community of 12.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's latest policy on public expenditure on the social, welfare, housing services and the infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

North Sea Oil Revenue

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total contribution of yields from North sea oil to the United Kingdom's gross domestic product in each financial year since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Sulphur Dioxide Pollution

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister why Her Majesty's Government have not yet signed the protocol committing Canada and 20 European countries to reduce sulphur dioxide pollution by 30 per cent.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer given on 4 July 1985 by my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the Member for Bristol, West in reply to a question by the Member for Central Suffolk Official Report, column 202.

WALES

Company Failures

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies supported by the Welsh Development Agency since 1975 have failed; and what has been the cost to public funds.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Eighty-one of the companies in which the Welsh Development Agency has invested funds since its establishment in January 1976 have subsequently failed. The losses involved amount to just under £8 million.

MV Bridgeness

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action was taken by his Department following the grounding of the MV Bridgeness on 16 June.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Central Government responsibility for shipping casualty investigations and for the clearance of oil pollution both at sea and on-shore resulting from civil accidents at sea rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. From the start of the incident our officials have maintained a close liaison with the marine pollution control unit of the Department of Transport, the local authorities whose areas were affected and the Nature Conservancy Council.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total expenditure of his Department and the agencies responsible to or sponsored by it, in Wales, for each fiscal year since 1978-79, in 1985 prices.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following list shows the total public expenditure which falls within my responsibility, for each financial year from 1978-79 to 1984-85. The totals shown have been adjusted to 1984-85 price levels by means of the relevant gross domestic product deflators.

£ million (1984-85 base)

	£ million
1978-79	2,652
1979-80	2,696
1980-81	2,703
1981-82	2,587
1982-83	2,610
1983-84	2,712
1984-85	*2,635

Voluntary Organisations (Awards)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce awards made to voluntary organisations under the special grants programme announced on 5 March.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am announcing today that awards totalling £60,000 have been made to seven organisations. The details are as follows:

Council for Protection of Rural Wales	10,000

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Brewster Housing Project

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his latest estimate of the cost of the Brewster housing project in the Falklands; and if he will give a breakdown of the main components in the cost per house.

Mr. Raison: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 14 January at column 19.

Cabbage Trees (St. Helena)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the varieties of cabbage trees which are present on St. Helena; what estimate he can make of individual numbers of each variety; and what steps he is taking to ensure the survival and general health of the various varieties.

Mr. Raison: There are four species of cabbage tree: the black cabbage tree, white cabbage tree, he-cabbage tree and she-cabbage tree. No estimates have been made of the individual numbers of each species, but the first three are quite widely distributed on the central ridge of the island. Efforts to propagate the rarer she-cabbage tree and introduce it into its natural environment are proving successful. A number of legal and practical measures have been taken to protect the endemic flora of St Helena, including cabbage trees. Earlier this year, a development aid allocation was approved for a five-year forestry project, one element of which is concerned with the conservation of endemic flora.

Famine Relief (Horn of Africa)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are his future plans for the relief of the famine in the Horn of Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: We plan to spend at least £60 million on famine relief in Africa during the 1985-86 financial year. This will be allocated to countries on the basis of need. Among the countries in the Horn of Africa, Ethiopia is likely to continue to be the major recipient. We shall also maintain the capacity within the aid programme to respond to appeals for famine relief from elsewhere.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid has been sent to the Horn of Africa as defined by country and per month since June 1984 for the following categories (a) the amount of financial aid, (b) the number of vehicles sent, (c) the number of aircraft sent and (d) the number of personnel sent.

Mr. Rifkind: Information on the emergency assistance we have provided to the countries in the Horn of Africa viz Ethiopia, Somalia and Djibouti, since June 1984 is set out in the following table. This information does not include our share of European Community emergency assistance to these three countries, nor the British response to appeals from international agencies for the famine in Africa, from which these countries are likely to benefit.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current negotiations about the future of Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: The United Nations Secretary-General is continuing his efforts to make progress towards a settlement in Cyprus. He has our full and active support.

Argentina

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of negotiations with Argentina on the future of trade relations and other matters.

Mr. Renton: Our decision to lift our ban on imports from Argentina has given the Argentine Government the opportunity to respond and thereby to open the way to further steps towards normalising bilateral relations. We regret its response has so far not been more constructive, but we still look to it to take practical steps to match our initiative to the benefit of both countries.

British Council

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government seek to extend the funding of British Council cultural programmes abroad.

Mr. Renton: We would not wish to anticipate the result of the public expenditure survey which will as usual be made known in my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement, nor the particular decisions my right hon. and learned Friend will take for the programmes for which he is responsible.

Terrorism (Tel Aviv)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what report he has received from Her Majesty's Ambassador in Baghdad regarding the claim by the Palestine Liberation Organisation on Voice of Palestine Radio in 7 July about two terrorist attacks on bus stations near Tel Aviv with loss of life; and whether any message has been conveyed to the Iraqi Government about these incidents.

Mr. Luce: We are aware of a Palestine Liberation Organisation claim to responsibility for two bomb attacks on 7 July but we have received no confirmation of the incidents or the extent of any casualties. We have not conveyed any message on this subject to the Iraqi Government.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in order the seven criminal offences which have led to the greatest number of people in prison, and if he will show the prison population in each case.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Tables 1.5, 3.2, 4.1 and 5.1 of the latest issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9363). The 1984 issue will be published in the near future.

Prisons

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women on rule 43 in prisons in the United Kingdom on 30 June.

Mr. Mellor: The number of sentenced prisoners in England and Wales who were segregated under Prison Rule 43 for their own protection or for reasons of good order or discipline as at 31 March 1985 (the latest date for which figures are available) was as follows:

	Own Request	Good Order or Discipline
Males	572	73
Females	1	6

Information is not kept centrally on the segregation of unconvicted prisoners. Responsibility for prison establishments in Scotland and Northern Ireland is for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the prisons in the United Kingdom where association does not take place.

Mr. Mellor: In England and Wales, association does not take place at HM prisons Liverpool, Manchester and Wandsworth.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present position regarding his Department's review of existing pay and sick pay rates being paid to prisoners at present in prisons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: The rates of inmate pay in England and Wales are reviewed annually. They are currently under consideration and revised rates of pay are expected to be brought into force on 7 October 1985. A departmental working party is reviewing the earnings systems currently in force, and will report by the end of the year. The earnings rates of prisoners in Scotland and Northern Ireland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively.

Prisoners (Outside Hospitals)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prisoners who have been sent to outside hospitals for treatment and have escaped from the hospital during each of the last three years.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of adult prisoners who escaped from outside hospitals to which they had been sent for treatment, either as in-patients or as out-patients, were as follows:

Year	Number
1982	20
1983	19
1984	25

Three such cases were reported in the first half of this year.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what kind of accommodation is provided by outside hospitals for prisoners sent to them for medical treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: This is determined at the time according to the circumstances of the case.

Street Collections

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions of individuals for holding street collections in London without a licence during the period March 1984 to March 1985 are now pending before the courts.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the number of persons summoned under the Street Collections (Metropolitan Police District) Regulations 1979 in respect of alleged unauthorised street collections made between 1 March 1984 and 31 March 1985, whose cases have yet to be dealt with by the courts, is 140.

Animal Experiments

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the introduction of legislation based on the White Paper Cmnd. 9521 entitled "Scientific Experiments on Living Animals" is dependent on the final adoption of the proposed Council of Europe convention for the protection of vertebrate animals used for experimental and other scientific purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The text of the convention was adopted at a meeting of Ministers' deputies on 31 May 1985. The convention will be opened for signature in the early autumn. I intend to introduce legislation based on the White Paper Cmnd. 9521 as soon as Parliamentary time permits; the introduction of such legislation is not directly dependent on the adoption of the convention.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of entries in the seen or checked in noteworthy circumstances sub-category of the stolen and suspect vehicle index of the police national computer for each of the months from April 1984 until September 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Statistics of the number of entries in the "seen" category are collected only once a month. For the period requested they are as follows:

1984	Number of entries in "seen" category Number
April	10,330
May	9,246
June	7,757
July	7,506
August	7,383
September	8,539

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the use of the new convictions index held on the police national computer; whether the index will be linked to the criminal names index; what is the projected size of the convictions index, the anticipated access rates and performance of the index; and when the index will be operational.

Mr. Shaw: The convictions file, which will be linked to the criminal names file, is intended to help the police with their operational duties, including the provision of information to the courts. The file is expected to be available to the service in 1987 by which time it is likely to contain details of some 2·5 million convictions recorded since 1981. It is not possible at this stage to provide an accurate estimate of the extent to which the police will use the new facility; response times are expected to be about five seconds.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of reported robberies with violence of persons over 60 years for each of the last 10 years and the number of convictions for such robberies for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: Information collected centrally on offences of robbery does not include the age of the victim(s) either for those offences recorded by the police or for those offences which were the subject of court proceedings; nor does it distinguish between robberies involving the use of violence and those involving only the threat of violence. The only information collected centrally on the age of victims of robbery relates to those offences in which a firearm was reported to have been used and is given in the following table; corresponding information for earlier years is not available. Information on all offences of robbery recorded by the police and on persons found guilty or cautioned for offences of robbery is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" in the volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349, chapter 2 for offences recorded, chapter 3 for those offences in which firearms were reported to have been used and chapter 5 for persons found guilty or cautioned.

Offences of robberies recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used and the principal victim was aged over 60 years

Remanded Persons

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women were being held on remand at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information is given in the following table:

Population of untried and convicted unsentenced prisoners in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on 31 May 1985: by age

Age	Untried prisoners		Convicted unsentenced prisoners	Number*
	Males	Females	Males	Females
Aged under 21	2,510	60	640	20
Adults	5,440	240	930	80
All ages	7,950	300	1,560	100

* The figures are rounded and components do not always add to the totals, because they have been rounded independently.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time people are held on remand for non-violent minor offences.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not available centrally on the average time spent on remand for different types of offences. The available information about the average time spent in custody relates to all untried and all convicted unsentenced prisoners and is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (table 2(g) of the latest issue for 1983, Cmnd 9363). Provisional estimates for males in 1984 were published in a Home Office Statistical Bulletin (Issue No. 8/85) on "The Prison Population in 1984".

Community Service Orders

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the percentage of people who have been sentenced to community service orders and who are later convicted of further crimes; and how this compares with other forms of sentence.

Mr. Mellor: Reconviction rates for those given community service orders, including comparison with reconviction rates for those discharged from custodial sentences, are published in "Reconvictions of Those Given Community Service Orders", Home Office Statistical Bulletin 18/83 (tables 1 and 2 and paragraph 12). Information on reconviction after other types of sentences can be found in "Previous Convictions, Sentence and Reconviction," Home Office Research Study No 53 (in particular figure 3.1). Copies of these publications are in the Library of the House. In comparing reconviction rates, it needs to be remembered that the main factors related to subsequent reconviction (sex, age on conviction, the number of previous convictions and the type of offence) are also likely to have influenced the sentence of the court.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now list those police forces which have agreed to participate in Brave Defender.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief officers of all the police forces in England and Wales have agreed to participate except for Durham.

Immigration

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of men who fall within the definition of Commonwealth citizens settled in the United Kingdom in section 1 (5) of the Immigration Act 1971; and how many of these men were born in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: I will reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give, for each of the years 1982, 1983, 1984 and for the first quarter of 1985, the numbers of wives accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom and the numbers refused and the reasons for refusal, together with the nationalities of wives both accepted and refused.

Mr. Waddington: The numbers of wives accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom in 1982, 1983 and 1984 were published by nationality in "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom" (Tables 2*(a)* and (b) and 3*(a)* and (b) of Cmnd. 8944 for 1982; tables 3 and 4 of Cmnd. 9246 for 1983, and of Cmnd. 9544 for 1984). Corresponding figures for the first quarter of 1985 are given in the following table. The information requested on refusals is not available.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the future of Holloway prison.

Mr. Brittan: The report of the Holloway project committee, which was set up last December under the chairmanship of the director of the south east region, Prison Department, has now been submitted to the Director General of the Prison Service and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

The project committee's report provides a valuable analysis of Holloway's difficulties. I very much welcome the committee's positive programme for an urgent increase in the prison's remand capacity, the development of its regimes, improvements in management structure, and ways of reviewing staff deployment to ensure that the prisoners get more time in association and more access to Holloway's extensive facilities. I want to see particular progress in the following areas.

I have asked for urgent consideration to be given to how Holloway's operating capacity can be increased to 400 as soon as possible, as the committee recommends. A manpower appraisal will be carried out and staff deployment at Holloway will be closely monitored, to ensure the most effective use of resources. The aim must be to provide as positive a regime as possible.

The specialist functions consequent on Holloway's role as the major local prison for women in the south-east will remain. These include the capacity to accommodate unsentenced women who are highly disturbed, many of whom will come within the ambit of mental health legislation but for whom a period of assessment in secure conditions may be required. These prisoners are presently accommodated on C1 unit. I accept the committee's view that C1 unit is not currently meeting their needs as well as it should, despite the best efforts of the staff, which I also commend, and that urgent action is needed to rectify its deficiencies. Its physical state is wholly unsatisfactory and its management structure is not clear. I acknowledge the desirability of re-siting C1 unit in purpose-built accommodation in a different part of the establishment and have asked for an urgent assessment of whether this is feasible.

But C1 cannot be rebuilt overnight. Immediate steps will be taken to improve conditions on the unit. Particular attention will be paid to improvements to the fabric, the replacement of potentially dangerous fittings, and the provision of more space for association. High priority will be given to improving the regime on C1 so that the prisoners there can take full advantage of the specialist training and therapeutic facilities available. The management structure and oversight of the unit will be reviewed. Particularly attention will be paid to the need to improve liaison between the nursing and discipline officer staff, and the need to create an environment conducive to the assessment and treatment of disturbed inmates. For as long as the unit contains both remand prisoners for assessment and difficult sentenced prisoners for special care, its routines must recognise the different requirements of these groups.

The rapid throughput of prisoners at Holloway has limited the extent to which the therapeutic unit for women prisoners with drug and other dependency problems has been able to fulfil its role. The unit will, as the committee recommends, be discontinued in its present form. Meanwhile, women with dependency problems who might benefit from a therapeutic regime will continue to be provided with specialist professional care on an individual basis.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Ethnic Minority Children

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made in putting into effect the commitments given in his statement on 14 March, Official Report, columns 451-52, about the report of the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: In the statement I made on the publication of the Swann committee's report, at columns 451-52, I said that the problem of underachievement at school was not confined to children from the ethnic minorities; and that one way in which the Government would try to improve the position of those children would therefore be through measures intended to raise performance generally. In the White Paper "Better Schools", published shortly after the Swann report, a wide range of policy initiatives — on the curriculum, on examinations and in other areas—was described. They will help tackle the obstacles to higher achievement and as they take effect ethnic minority children will share in the benefit. These policies form the background to the more specific steps we have been taking in response to the Swann report, some of which are outlined below.

We need improved statistical information in order to monitor and secure progress. I informed the House on 11 July, at columns 483-84, that the Department was issuing a consultation paper setting out specific proposals for the collection of statistics on the ethnic origins of teachers and students in teacher training. I intend to establish a working group in the autumn to explore how the scheme might operate. I have also considered an interim report from a working group on the collection of ethnically based statistics on school pupils. I am aware that there is particular concern about the implications of the collection of such statistics by central Government. As a first step, I have therefore asked the group to report to me by the end of the year with proposals for the collection of statistics on a compatible basis at local level.

The response of the education system to ethnic diversity is the theme of some 40 different pilot projects, at a total cost of £1 million, which are being supported through education support grants in 1985-86. A further £1 million is being made available under regulations made on 10 July to support new projects in this area in 1986-87. Officials of the Department have also held preliminary discussions with the local authority associations on the possibility that the in-service training grants scheme should, as the Swann committee recommended, be extended to include training dealing with the need to respond to ethnic diversity: I shall propose this formally to the associations in the autumn. As to initial teacher training, I shall be writing to the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education drawing attention to those of the criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses which bear on the response to ethnic diversity and to the Swann committee's recommendations that all teacher training students should have an opportunity to gain teaching experience in a multi-racial school.

Equally important is the need to recruit more ethnic minority teachers. I informed the House on 11 July, at columns 484-85, that the Department was issuing a consultation paper which invites views on the possible reasons for the apparent under-representation of ethnic minorities in the teacher force and on ways of countering this. Comments are being sought from a wide audience including many ethnic minority organisations.

I have referred to our policies for reforming the curriculum and the examination system generally. Attention is also being paid specifically to the implications of ethnic diversity in both contexts. The School Curriculum Development Committee and the Secondary Examinations Council have agreed to co-operate on multi-ethnic matters. The SCDC has agreed to ensure that all its projects have due regard to the ethnic diversity of our schools. The SEC will explore means of improving its syllabuses and examinations in community languages, and is enlisting specialist advisers to help in this work. Meanwhile, Her Majesty's Inspectorate is continuing to encourage good practice in English language and mother tongue teaching; an HMI conference on the teaching of mother tongues is being held for chief education officers and others in September.

Much remains to be done, but I believe that a worthwhile start has been made.

Teachers, Pupils and Schools

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state (a) the number of teachers, (b) the number of pupils and (c) the number of schools, in 1960, 1970 and 1985 in local education authorities throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dunn: The numbers of maintained schools, pupils and teachers in England in the years 1960, 1970 and 1984 are:

	Full-time equivalent number of teachers in schools	Pupils Full-time	Part-time	Number of schools
January 1960	256,891	6,481,648	1,703	26,698
January 1970	329,387	7,477,247	27,631	26,137
January 1984	*390,279	7,216,962	194,469	24,464

* The figure for 1984 relates to qualified teachers only. Data for January 1985 will be available later this year. Information for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

School Books (Hertfordshire)

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the expenditure on books for schools by Hertfordshire county council in each of the last five years in terms of (a) cash, (b) real terms and (c) real terms per pupil in school.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is given in the table:

HMI Report

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what data were available to Her Majesty's inspectorate on the basis of which it reported, in paragraph 7 of its report on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on education provision in England in 1984, a statistically significant association between certain levels of resource provision and certain qualities of work; what is its definition of a satisfactory level of resource provision; what test it applied to the information to establish its statistical significance; and what data were used by Her Majesty's Inspectorate to establish the order of importance of four factors, mentioned in the same paragraph, as influencing effective teaching.

Sir Keith Joseph: During the autumn term 1984 Her Majesty's Inspectorate gathered information about 13,880 classes which had been observed. It first assessed the quality of work in each class, both in terms of the quality of the provision made by the teacher, and of pupils' response.

Where provision was satisfactory, the resources were adequate and appropriate to support the material being taught. What is adequate and appropriate will vary not only with the work taught but with the age, ability and aptitude of the pupils.

Having judged the quality of the work, Her Majesty's Inspectorate then indicated those factors which, in the light of the evidence available, were considered to be influencing the quality of the work in each lesson. The aggregation of these responses from the 13,880 lessons, when analysed using a chi-squared test, revealed that work assessed as satisfactory or better was significantly more likely than chance alone would lead one to expect to be found where resource provision was judged satisfactory and helpful to the work. This does not imply a direct casual relationship between levels of resources and quality of education.

The four factors mentioned in paragraph 7—quality of teaching, identification of pupils' and students' needs, the level of resources available and their effective management and deployment—were among those whose contribution to effective learning Her Majesty's Inspectorate assessed in its observation of the classes. The identification of the four factors as important, and the order of their importance, was established by the frequency of their mention in reports of these observations.

Student Support

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish his Department's review of the student financial support system.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the Government's consultative paper on student support; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am now considering the publication later in the year of a consultative document in which loans would not feature as an option.

Local Authority Business (Inquiry)

Mr. Howard asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will be submitting evidence to the committee of inquiry into the conduct of local authority business.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department is submitting evidence today and a copy of the memorandum is being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

ENVIRONMENT

Derelict Land

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the priorities for derelict land grant and the operation of the grant regime.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since taking office we have increased derelict land grant from £23 million in 1979-80 to £76 million in 1985-86. This shows our continuing commitment to the recovery of derelict land. This makes a vital contribution to urban renewal. I have today issued for consultation a draft circular on derelict land grant. The circular underlines the need to reuse land in our towns and cities. It stresses that priority will be given to reclamation schemes which lead to land being made available for private housing, industrial or commercial development, especially in urban areas. The early commitment of a developer in such schemes will no longer be required; the important factor is the intended use by the local authorities of the reclaimed land. Environmental schemes in the worst areas of derelication, where the surroundings often inhibit investment, will also be encouraged.

Rolling programmes will be considered for the extensive areas of derelication, allowing authorities to plan reclamation over a number of years with greater confidence.

The draft circular also draws attention to the important part private owners can play in reclaiming their land, with the help of grant, to bring it back into productive use.

Besides improving the quality of life, reclamation relieves pressure for development on our green belts and agricultural land. We must now maintain the progress we have made over the past few years.

Copies of the draft circular have been placed in the Library.

Swans

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet received a report by the Nature Conservancy Council on lead poisoning of swans; and what action he proposes to take on it.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Yes. The Nature Conservancy Council has reported to me on the problem of lead poisoning of swans. Its recent review concluded that, whilst there has been a small increase in total swan numbers since 1978, more than 3,000 swans continue to die each year by ingesting anglers' lead weights. Evidence suggests that it is recently discarded weights, not yet sunk into the mud, which do the most damage. This is despite the co-operation of anglers' associations in encouraging the use of non-toxic alternatives to lead.

The NCC therefore confirms its recommendations to phase out the use of lead shot by anglers by December 1986. If the voluntary phasing out which it supports proves to be ineffective, it recommends that the sale and use of split lead weights (except the smallest weights) and ledger weights (up to 2oz) should be prohibited.

The Government accept these recommendations and the timetable for action set out in them. We propose to take action in two stages aimed at securing the total withdrawal of the relevent split lead weights for angling purposes by the end of 1986. First, we have asked the NCC and the Sports Council actively to campaign to persuade anglers not to use lead weights during the coarse fishing season that has just opened. Meanwhile, a technical group, including representatives of the National Angling Organisations and of manufacturers, is considering ways to speed the further refinement and encourage wider use of the alternatives to lead weights which are now available. I welcome the group's recent announcement that one range of products provides satisfactory alternatives to lead shot and that development of other products is also encouraging.

I welcome the support for the ending of the use of lead weights given by sections of the press including the Daily Mirror.

I am also pleased to learn that a meeting of representatives of national angling organisations has subsequently agreed that the supply of angler's lead shot ought to end within two years.

For their part, the Government propose immediately to ban the use of lead weights by those applying for new licences to fish in the royal parks. Existing licences will not be affected, but steps will be taken to encourage all anglers in the royal parks to use alternative weights.

Water authorities in England and Wales have powers to make byelaws to ban the use of lead weights for fishing. My right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales will shortly be issuing draft model byelaws, to aid the water authorities in considering whether they wish to propose such a ban in their areas. We hope that the voluntary approach, supported as it is by the responsible angling organisations, may achieve success during the present angling season of 1985-86. However, if the voluntary approach has had insufficient effect by the end of the season the Government will be prepared to introduce regulations to control the sale and import of lead shot for fishing in the United Kingdom. Consultations on regulations, under section 100 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, will begin as soon as possible, so that if necessary they may be brought into effect on 1 January 1987.

Smith Houses

Sir Reginald Eyre asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will name the building societies referred to in the Adjournment debate on 18 June, Official Report, column 275, as being prepared to lend upon the security of Smith houses.

Mr. Gow: I understand that the Halifax and the Abbey National building societies are prepared to lend on Smith houses in the west midlands, subject to the usual requirement of a satisfactory survey and valuation; and that certin local societies, including the West Bromwich and the Staffordshire, would be willing to lend subject to a satisfactory structural survey or engineer's report.

Housebuilding

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many public sector houses were completed in 1975, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Sir George Young: The number of public sector dwellings completed in England in each of the years 1975 to 1984 appear in table 2 of my Department's press notice No. 324 issued on 4 July; a copy is available in the Library.

Sewers (Standards)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to harmonise the standards laid down in respect of new sewers by (a) water authorities and (b) the building regulations.

Mr. Gow: This complex and important matter is being examined in a review of water and sewerage law being carried out by my Department. I will inform the House of our conclusions.

St. Barnabas Community Centre, Bristol

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet approved an application under the urban programme for 1985-86 for St. Barnabas Community Centre, St. Pauls, Bristol.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend recently approved an application for capital works totalling £45,839 to improve the Old School. In addition, he approved £37,100 revenue for staff and running costs.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain the precise reasons for his decision to cut urban aid programme funding for the Moss Side information technology centre 6502; and what assessment he has made of the impact of his decision on the viability of the centre.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The exceptional extension of urban programme assistance towards running costs for a further period of three years should allow the centre to continue to operate.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give details of all moneys given to each information technology centre, and of moneys for which each of them is still eligible under the urban aid programme;

(2) if he will indicate what criteria are used in determining the level of support for each information technology centre under the urban programme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The criteria for support of urban programme projects are set out in the ministerial guidelines for the urban programme, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House on 9 May 1985. The precise level of support for each ITEC depends, among other things, on the amount of funding obtained from other sources, and the priority given to the project by the local authority concerned.

Details of the moneys made available to individual ITECs for each year under the urban programme are not readily available, but in 1984-85 they received a total of about £600,000.

Consent Applications

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications have now been received under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is set out in the table below.

Applications received under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 as amended by clause 93 of the Local Government Bill

	Number
Greater London Council	521
Inner London Education Authority	28
Greater Manchester Council	208
Merseyside County Council	83
South Yorkshire County Council	236
Tyne and Wear County Council	105
West Midlands County Council	264
West Yorkshire County Council	95
Total	1,540

Domestic Rates

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he makes of (i) the number of households in England paying domestic rates (a) in full and (b) rebated, and (ii) the total number of adults, 18 years and over, resident in those households.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are about 18 million domestic hereditaments in England. Based on local authority returns, it is estimated that 6·2 million ratepayers received rate rebates in 1984-85. The total number of adults aged 18 years and over in England is estimated to be 35·7 million in mid 1984.

Widdicombe Committee of Inquiry

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects that the interim report of the Widdicombe committee of inquiry will be published.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Widdicombe committee of inquiry has been asked to submit its interim report by the end of this month. The precise date of submission is, however, a matter for the committee. The report will be published as soon as possible thereafter.

Building Act 1984

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to table regulations to give effect to the Building Act 1984.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to the reply, 25 March 1985, c. 11]: I have today laid before Parliament two sets of building regulations. The Building Regulations 1985 will come into operation on 11 November. They are much shorter and simpler than the present regulations, and eliminate controls over the erection of certain small buildings and small extensions and over some alterations and changes of use. The regulations will be subject to continuing review to ensure that they comply fully with the principles for minimising regulatory controls set out in the Government's White Paper "Lifting the Burden".

The new regulations will be supported by approved documents giving practical guidance on how to meet the requirements and by the mandatory rules for means of escape in case of fire, published by HMSO on 8 July. There will also be a manual to the building regulations which will contain the regulations, explain the new systems of control and provide a link between the technical requirements and the approved documents. Copies of these documents have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and should be available to the public before the middle of August.

The Building (Approved Inspectors etc) Regulations 1985 set out the detailed procedures for operating the system of private certification, to provide developers with an alternative option to local authority supervision. Those who continue to use the local authority system will be able to provide certificates given by approved persons that their plans comply with the regulations on structural stability or energy conservation.

I am considering an application from the National House-Building Council to be approved as an inspector for dwellings, and the insurance scheme which it is proposing to offer, when acting in this new capacity. I intend in due course to designate professional bodies for the purpose of approving individual inspectors and persons, and will be continuing discussions with them and the insurance industry on possible ways of providing adequate protection for those who suffer damage resulting from the negligence of an approved inspector or person.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment and Training Schemes (Funding)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment what financial assistance the European Economic Community has given towards employment and training schemes in Scotland in each of the past two years; and if he will make a statement on future funding.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The European Commission allocated approximately £52 million from the European social fund towards employment and training schemes in Scotland in 1983, and approximately £49 million in 1984. Figures for 1985 are not yet available. Future allocations from the social fund will depend on the ability of promoters to mount schemes which meet the guidelines for the management of the fund in 1986-88 recently announced by the Commission.

EEC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on recent discussions in the EEC Labour and Social Affairs Council concerning the proposals for directives on (a) information and consultation of workers and (b) voluntary part-time work stating in particular the stance taken by each EEC country.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) on 25 June at column 370. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the stance taken by other EC member states at the Council.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has held with his EEC counterparts concerning the draft directive on parental leave; if he will list the remaining Government objections to the draft directive; if he will place in the Library a copy of the most recent draft under discussion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) on 10 June at column 358; and to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) on 25 June at column 370.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter submitted to the EEC Labour and Social Affairs Council concerning the equal treatment of men and women and the implementation of Directive 76/207/EEC.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have placed a copy of the letter in the Library of the House. I am arranging for a copy to be sent to the hon. Member.

It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Sheep Worrying

41. Mr. Kennedy asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what was the number of proceedings instituted by procurators fiscal in Scotland for offences related to sheep worrying in 1984 and in 1985 to date.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Provisional figures for 1984 indicate that 130 persons were proceeded against for contraventions of the Dogs (Protection of Livestock) Act 1953. No figures are yet available for 1985. The provisions of the Act extend to animals other than sheep and it is not possible to determine which cases relate specifically to sheep worrying.

Speeding Offences

42. Sir Hector Monro asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many road users have been prosecuted in the latest convenient year for exceeding the speed limit; and how many cases used evidence obtained (a) by radar gun, (b) by stop watch and (c) by trailing by police car, respectively.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Provisional figures for 1984 indicate that 5,692 persons were proceeded against for speeding offences. As I have previously indicated, no figures are separately kept of the means used to detect motorists committing speeding offences.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980

43. Mr. Ewing asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions there have been under part V of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Between 1 February 1981, when the provisions of part V of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1980 were brought into force, and the end of 1984, 1,197 persons were prosecuted under sections 69, 70, 72, 73 and 74 of the Act.

46. Mr. Maxton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he next intends to meet procurators fiscal to discuss the operation of sections 1 to 3 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have no immediate plans to meet procurators fiscal to discuss the operation of sections 1 to 3 of the 1980 Act.

Travelling People

44. Mr. Lambie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions of travelling people have taken place in Scotland for offences other than trespass in the last year.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: This information is not available. My department does not discriminate between different groups in the community either in enforcing the general criminal law or recording information about prosecutions.

Legal Aid

45. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he will next meet the Scottish Law Commission to discuss legal aid.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I have meetings, formal and informal, with the commission from time to time, but no meeting to discuss legal aid has been arranged.

Diligence

47. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he expects to receive the report from the Law Commission on the reform of the law of diligence in Scotland; and when Her Majesty's Government expects to bring forward legislation on the subject.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The Scottish Law Commission's first and main report on diligence was received in the middle of last month. The report is now being printed and will be laid before Parliament and published in the autumn.

My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I are very conscious of the public concern that the diligences used to enforce debts should be reformed. It is, however, necessary to take full account of the public reaction to the commission's detailed recommendations, when they are published, before determining when appropriate legislation might be brought forward.

Police (Alleged Assaults)

48. Mr. Hirst asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many cases of alleged police assaults were reported to procurators fiscal in each of the past five years; and how many resulted in successful prosecution.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The number of cases of alleged assault by police officers reported to procurators fiscal or regional procurators fiscal is not available. The following table shows the number of such cases reported by regional procurators fiscal to Crown Office for consideration of proceedings, and their outcome:

	Number of Cases	Number of Persons Prosecuted	Number Convicted
1980	278	17	N/A
1981	278	17	N/A
1982	317	28	N/A
1983	366	16	5
1984	428	12	1

N/A=not available

General statistics of complaints against the police, which however draw no distinction between alleged assaults and other forms of alleged misconduct, are available in the annual reports in the Library of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Crown Office (Proceedings)

49. Mr. Maclennan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland in what circumstances the Crown Office makes a statement announcing its decision that no further proceedings will be taken against an individual when it decides not to proceed.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: An intimation to an accused person that no proceedings are to be taken constitutes a complete bar to any proceedings thereafter, at the instance of the Crown, and such intimation is given only where it is clearly correct to do so. On the other hand, it is recognised that accused persons, complainers and indeed the public have a legitimate interest in knowing at the earliest possible date what is to happen in cases of interest to them. It is therefore essential that a balanced and careful judgment be made in every case according to its own circumstances.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Steel Industry

37. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the steel industry in Scotland.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Scottish works of the British Steel Corporation have made a valuable contribution to the corporation's performance in 1984-85, which is reflected in its published accounts.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the proportion of all capital investment in the United Kingdom made in manufacturing industry for each year since 1980.

Mr. Channon: The required information is given in the following table:

Investment in UK manufacturing industry as a proportion of total gross domestic capital formation*

Year	Per cent.
1980	18
1981	15
1982	14
1983	13
1984	14

* Divisions 2-4, Standard Industrial Classification (Revised 1980) including assets leased to manufacturers from the financial industries.

EC (Trade Documents)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in the introduction of the single administrative document for all inter-Community trade; and what is the expected date by which it will be used for all such trade.

Mr. Channon: The basic regulation and regulation introducing the specimen single document itself were approved by the Internal Market Council in December 1984. Subsequent discussions on the implementation provisions are now nearing completion. The form and its associated procedures are to be tested in trials, to take place later this year and early next year, and will be implemented on 1 January 1988.

EC (Health Protection)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made within the European Community for the complete harmonisation of national rules for health protection.

Mr. Channon: A number of directives harmonising national rules in the area of health protection have been adopted. A list of further Commission proposals for directives to be adopted by 1992 on veterinary and phytosanitary controls, food law, pharmaceutical and high-technology medicines, and chemical products and other manufactured goods are given in the annex to the Commission's White Paper—"Completing the Internal Market". A copy of this White Paper is available in the Library.

High-technology Exports

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what conveniently available figures he has for the average time it takes a British exporter of high-technology equipment to receive a decision or a COCOM application, compared with the practice by Governments in Germany and Italy.

Mr. Channon: I regret that this information is not available.

Small Businesses

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what specific measures he plans to undertake to implement the proposals contained in his Department's report on the scrutiny of administrative and legislative requirements in small businesses.

Mr. Butcher: The White Paper "Lifting the Burden" laid yesterday before the House announced action on both company and consumer law, including rationalising company law filing requirements; taking decisions after consultation on the need for statutory audits of small companies and on simplifying the content of small company accounts; rationalising legislation on misleading price indications; introducing a new general duty on product safety and taking decisions, after consultation, on action to implement recommendations in the Eden report.

Shipbuilding (Aid)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has held with the European Commission concerning aid to the shipbuilding industry; what action the Government intend to take following the limits to aid announced by the Commission; what is the Government's assessment of the degree of overcapacity in the EEC shipbuilding industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) on 5 July, at column 275.

Copyright

Mr. Ashe asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards assisting those whose United Kingdom copyrights are infringed in Singapore, particularly with regard to printed works; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps Her Majesty's Government take in the countries concerned to protect the interests of United Kingdom copyright holders (a) generally and (b) of printed works, where products which have been produced elsewhere in violation of United Kingdom copyrights are offered for sale; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what discussions the Minister for Trade, the right hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) had with the Government of Singapore about infringements of United Kingdom copyrights in Singapore in the course of his recent visit (a) generally and (b) with particular reference to books; what response was made; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what information he has as to measures being taken by the Government of Singapore to protect (a) by legislation, (b) by enforcement of existing law and (c) by administrative measures the copyright of foreign works; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to take action to seek to reduce the level of infringement in Singapore of United Kingdom copyrights of printed works; and if he will make a statement;

(6) what information he has as to the estimated annual cost to the United Kingdom book industry of infringements in Singapore of United Kingdom copyrights of printed works and as to the trend in the level of such costs over the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Government take every available opportunity to impress on countries whose copyright law and enforcement procedures fail to protect United Kindgom copyright owners the inequity of permitting unauthorised exploitation of foreign copyright material. Such countries are urged to join the international copyright conventions and to enact effective copyright law. The Government continue to be concerned at the inadequacy of copyright protection for foreign works in Singapore and at the extent of piracy there of United Kingdom copyright material, including printed works. The scale of such piracy cannot be accurately estimated, but it is known to be considerable. The high commission maintains contact with the Singapore authorities on this issue, which I also raised during my recent visit to Singapore. I was informed by the acting Minister of Trade and Minister of Finance that the authorities recognised the need for revision of existing law. New legislation was under consideration, although no timetable could be given. Singapore copyright law is at present based on the United Kingdom Copyright Act 1911. The Singapore High Court has recently confirmed that this law is applicable to works first published in the United Kingdom. However, the available penalties and enforcement procedures are inappropriate to modern conditions.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish details of moneys made available by his Department to each information technology centre for each financial year since its inception, and of moneys for which each one is eligible in the future.

Mr. Pattie: The information is not available without disproportionate costs. Each ITeC is entitled to £75,000 DTI grant over a period of three years. For each of the financial years since the inception of the programme the total DTI expenditure on ITeCs has been:

Financial year	£ million
1982-83	1·2
1983-84	3·0
1984-85	4·1

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of Trade and Industry if he will indicate what criteria are used in determining the level of support for each information technology centre.

Mr. Pattie: There are no selective criteria which determine the level of DTI support for ITeCs. Provided the original application to establish an ITeC is sound, each centre is entitled to £75,000 over its first three years of operation. DTI funds are mostly used for capital purchases and top-up of staff salaries, and enable centres to involve themselves in activities in addition to their main role of providing YTS training.

BL (Corporate Plan)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what extent provision is made in the BL corporate plan for initial investment in engine technology necessary to comply with the European Economic Community requirements on car exhaust emissions; what estimate is available to him of the likely eventual cost of this investment; and if he will make it his policy to authorise any necessary additional investment for this purpose within the framework of BL's corporate plan.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The assumptions and investment forecasts for particular elements in the BL corporate plan are commercially confidential. Any adjustments to the company's plans on account of European Community vehicle emissions requirements would be considered by the Government in the framework of the corporate planning process operated under the memorandum of understanding between BL and the Secretary of State.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Defendants (Medical Treatment)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General if he will list the number of defendants in Crown courts in each year since 1979 who had been recommended for medical or psychiatric treatment but whom the judge subsequently sent to prison.

The Attorney-General: This information is not available.

DEFENCE

Military Assistance

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many countries in the Caribbean received visits by advisory teams and loan personnel or received military assistance in 1984; and if he will name the countries;

(2) if he will list the countries to which the United Kingdom has given military assistance in the last financial year.

Mr. Stanley: The list of countries and territories provided with military assistance in 1984-85, either in the form of training by Her Majesty's Armed Forces in the United Kingdom or through members of Her Majesty's Armed Forces serving overseas on loan or secondment, is as follows:

Algeria	Malaysia
Australia	Maldives
Bahamas	Mauritius
Bahrain	Montserrat
Bangladesh	Mozambique
Barbados	Nepal
Belgium	Netherlands
Belize	New Zealand
Bermuda	Nigeria
Botswana	Norway
Brazil	Oman
Brunei	Pakistan
Canada	Philippines
Chile	Portugal
Denmark	Qatar
Ecuador	St. Vincent
Egypt	Saudi Arabia
Fiji	Senegal
Federal Republic of Germany	Sierra Leone
Fiji	Singapore
Finland	South Korea
France	Spain
Gambia	Sri Lanka
Ghana	Sudan
Greece	Swaziland
Guyana	Sweden
Hong Kong	Switzerland
Iceland	Tanzania
India	Thailand
Indonesia	Trinidad and Tobago
Iraq	Tunisia
Israel	Turkey
Italy	Uganda
Jamaica	UAE
Japan	USA
Jordan	Venezuela
Kenya	Yemen Arab Republic
Kuwait	Yugoslavia
Lebanon	Zaire
Lesotho	Zambia
Libya	Zimbabwe
Malawi

All these countries in the Caribbean area who received military assistance in the form of United Kingdom loan service or secondment personnel or training in the United Kingdom in calendar year 1984 are included in this list. Records of other miscellaneous types of military assistance are not held centrally on a world-wide basis.

Submarines

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if any British uranium will be sent to the United States of America for enrichment to provide fuel for the Trident submarines;

(2) whether facilities in the United Kingdom are adequate for all stages of enrichment, manufacture and reprocessing of fuel materials for (a) nuclear-powered submarines in service and (b) nuclear-powered Trident submarines; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether facilities in the United States of America have been used in the enrichment and manufacture of fuel materials for British nuclear-powered submarines; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether facilities in the United States of America will be used in the enrichment and manufacture of fuel materials for nuclear-powered Trident submarines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The United Kingdom does not currently have adequate facilities to deal with all the stages involved in the manufacture and reprocessing of fuel materials either for nuclear-powered submarines already in service or for Trident submarines. Facilities in the United States of America have been used in the past to enrich uranium for United Kingdom submarine fuel. For the future, under the arrangements outlined by the then Secretary of State for Defence in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bebington and Ellesmere Port (Vol. 26, column 128-9), the fuel requirements for the United Kingdom's Trident submarines will be met by the enrichment of natural uranium to an intermediate level at British Nuclear Fuels plc's site at Capenhurst, from where it will be transported to the United States of America for final enrichment to the level required for defence purposes.

Naval Explosions (Solent)

Mr. Hamerock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many claims for compensation have been made to his Department due to damage caused by various naval explosions in the Solent over the last 10 years; and if his Department has paid compensation for any damage caused.

Mr. Lee: Two claims have been received for property damage compensation arising from naval explosions in the Solent over the past 10 years. Compensation was agreed in one case; the second was repudiated on the basis of expert advice.

Installations (Ground Defence)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States of America and British plans for the ground defence of vital installations in the United Kingdom have been integrated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Plans for the ground defence of US vital installations in the United Kingdom are integrated into our overall home defence plans. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 21 March (Vol. 75, columns 585 to 586) exercise Brave Defender will test our revised home defence plans and procedures and some US forces will participate in the exercise.

SCOTLAND

NHS (Patient Care)

13. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimates he has made of the likely effects on the quality of patient care in the National Health Service of his proposed arrangements for financing the recent pay awards for medical and nursing staff.

Mr. John MacKay: It should be possible for health boards to meet the full cost of pay awards to medical and nursing staff this year from within the resources made available to them, without affecting services to patients.

Agricultural Research and Advisory Services

14. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the funding of agricultural advisory and research services by his Department.

Mr. John Mackay: A consultative paper was issued in May by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland discussing a possible strategy for agricultural research and development services over the next decade and having regard to projected reductions in public funding. A similar consultative document about the advisory services provided by the Scottish agricultural colleges under revised funding arrangements will be issued later this year. Responses to these consultation papers will be carefully considered before any final decisions are made.

Labour Statistics

15. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on current levels of unemployment in Scotland.

28. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures for Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in Scotland was 345,635, a fall of 2,273 from the May figure. The seasonally adusted figure showed a slight increase in unemployment over that month. The increase was the lowest recorded this year.

Teachers

16. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make an up-to-date statement on the latest position relating to the pay and conditions of service of teachers in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Following the Secretary of State's meeting with the education committee of COSLA last month at which there was broad agreement on a teacher's job description, technical discussions are proceeding within the management side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education about the outline of a possible package on pay and conditions of service. Adjusting the existing expenditure plans for the current financial year is no longer a practical proposition. However, the Government would be willing to provide some additional resources for teachers' pay in the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87, provided that agreement can be achieved on an acceptable package. I very much hope that progress can be made towards that objective.

17. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average salary of an un-promoted secondary school teacher in Scotland in (a) June 1980 and (b) today, expressed (i) as a real figure and (ii) in relation to the retail price index.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information about the average salaries of un-promoted secondary school teachers is not separately available from the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education. However, the SJNC carries out a salaries survey in October of each year and, based on this information, the average annual salary of a secondary school teacher was £8,037 in 1980 and £10,296 in 1984. Based on movements in the retail price index between October 1980 and October 1984, the 1980 salary is equivalent to an indexed salary of £10,577 at October 1984.

Council House Sales

18. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the progress being made with the sale of council houses in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Yes. Since 1979 over 69,000 public sector tenants have bought their houses; binding contracts of sale have been concluded in a further 3,250 cases; and there are approximately another 5,500 applications at an earlier point in the pipeline. Authorities are also increasingly appreciating the need to process sales quickly. The average time taken to complete transactions has fallen to approximately nine months.

Leasehold Property

19. Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to deal with the problem of house owners whose property is on land the lease of which is due to expire in the next 15 years.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so.

Roads (Ayrshire)

20. Mr. Lamble asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will discuss with Strathclyde regional council a new roads programme to connect Ayrshire with the main Scottish motorway system.

Mr. Ancram: Improvements to trunk roads A75, A76, A77 and A78 are in preparation. The development of the local road network is a matter for Strathclyde regional council. I would naturally consider carefully any proposals that the region puts to me in its periodic transport policies and programme statements.

Coal Industry

21. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the level of investment in the Scottish coalfield.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board. The Government remain committed to very substantial financial support for the coal industry over the next two years. It is for the NCB to determine how these funds can best be invested in the Scottish and other coalfields. This year alone the NCB is investing more than £20 million in Scotland in new developments and some of the most technically advanced mining machinery.

Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council

22. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the report of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The chairman of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council has informed my right hon. Friend that the council expects to submit its report on the future strategy for higher education in Scotland by about the end of October.

Teachers (Dispute)

23. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on the course of the teacher's dispute in Scottish schools.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There has been no strike action since the week beginning 17 June, and Scottish schools are now on holiday. I understand that the EIS has threatened intensified industrial action next session. Since the teachers' side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee has refused to submit a pay claim, no increase can be negotiated for the current year. I hope that negotiations on a medium-term pay and conditions of service package will begin. My right hon. Friend has made it clear that extra resources would be made available in the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87 if an acceptable package is negotiated by October.

Rate Relief

24. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is yet in a position to estimate how much of the money recently allocated to rate relief is expected to be paid out under the provisions of the Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985.

Mr. Ancram: I told the House on 19 June, at column 281 that the cost of rebates in 1985-86 under the Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985 was estimated to be around £30 million. I shall let the hon. Member have a copy of a table giving the breakdown of these costs by rating authority, as estimated by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Fife Regional Council (Expenditure)

25. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the cost to Fife ratepayers of the expenditure in excess of guidelines by Fife regional council.

Mr. Ancram: The rate set by Fife regional council for 1985-86 includes 8·1p in respect of the council's budgeted excess over guidelines and provision for a grant penalty in 1985-86 and a deficit carried forward from 1984-85 resulting from the grant penalty for overspending in that year. This amounts to some £14·72 million of rate income and is costing the average domestic ratepayer in Fife almost £50.

Employment Situation

26. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will have discussions with the Scottish Trades Union Congress about the employment situation in Scotland following the dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to hold discussions of this sort.

Whisky Industry

27. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been lost in the Scotch whisky industry in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information in the form requested is not available, but the estimated changes in the numbers employed in each of the years 1974 to 1982 from each previous year, in the spirit distilling and compounding industry in Scotland, are +2,600, −1,200, −500, +500, +1,300, 0, −700, −2,000 and −1,900 respectively. Estimates for the years to 1978 are based on the annual census of employment; those for the later years shown are based on the annual census of production. Estimates for 1983, 1984 and 1985 are not available.

Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering

29. Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, if he will make a statement on the basis of the proposed reduction in grant of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering.

Mr. Younger: The proposals set out in the consultation paper "A Strategy for Agricultural Research and Development" are based on the need to adjust programmes of research and development in tune with the changing circumstances and needs of the industry and the wider community, to achieve savings in public expenditure and to encourage increased funding from the industry itself. Responses to the paper are being received and considered. No decision has been taken on the level of the future funding of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering.

Scientific Research and Development

30. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on support from his Department's budget for scientific research and development in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: Expenditure by my Departments on support for research and development in Scotland is estimated to total about £55 million during the current financial year.

Steel Industry

31. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next proposes to meet the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss the steel industry.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I met STUC representatives on 7 June when we discussed a number of subjects, including future investment at Ravenscraig. We have no plans for a further meeting in the near future.

Elderly Mentally Ill Persons

32. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the present provision of facilities for the care and treatment of the elderly mentally sick in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I have urged health boards to give high priority to the development of mental health services including services for the elderly with mental disability and I am monitoring performance. The Scottish Health Service planning council has set up a working group to review, inter alia, recommendations concerning this group in the report "Scottish Health Authorities' Priorities for the Eighties" and to prepare revised guidelines covering the period up to 1992.

Salmon Stocks

33. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland from what organisations and individuals he has recently received representations about the state of salmon stocks.

Mr. John MacKay: Further to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 19 June 1985 I can say that representations have been received from a number of organisations representative of salmon fishing interests including the Association of Scottish District Salmon Fishery Boards, the Salmon Net Fishing Association of Scotland, the Atlantic Salmon Trust and the Salmon Conservancy, from hon. Members on behalf of their constituents and from individual members of the public.

Inverclyde Training Centre, Greenock

34. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the Inverclyde training centre, Greenock.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I met a delegation from the Inverclyde training centre support group, which the hon. Member accompanied, on 20 June. I was impressed by the case the group made for taking over responsibility for the centre from British Shipbuilders (Training, Education and Safety) Ltd. and I subsequently wrote to support the group's proposals. I was pleased to learn that the BS(TES) board has now agreed in principle to the transfer of the training centre to the group.

Agricultural Research and Advisory Services

35. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has had about the reduction in the research and development and advisory services of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Younger: Representations have been received from a number of organisations and individuals expressing their views on the proposed reductions in public expenditure on agricultural research and development and advisory services, and in response to my Department's consultation paper "A Strategy for Agricultural Research and Development" on which comments were sought by the end of June.

Electricity Boards

36. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the chairman of the electricity boards in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to meet the chairmen of the boards. I met the chairman and members of the North of Scotland Hydro-electric Board in March and the chairman and members of the South of Scotland Electricity Board in April this year, when a number of general issues of current interest were discussed.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands for which felling licences for conversion of the land to agriculture were issued in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's east Scotland conservancy and west Scotland conservancy.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in the negotiations with the European Commission concerning the issue of the calibration of refrigerated sea-water tanks on board Community fishing vessels.

Mr. John MacKay: The European Commission is aware of the value of having such tanks calibrated for monitoring pelagic fisheries and are in the initial stage of considering the extension of their use. It should be stressed that whether this method is available or not, member states are obliged to check and report the catches of their vessels. The recent introduction of log books and landing declarations is expected to lead to more accurate recording.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fisheries Research Vessel

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the latest fisheries research vessel is not to be built in the Appledore shipyard.

Mr. MacGregor: A full evaluation was made of competing bids for the latest fisheries research vessel. Shipyards were visited and assessments made of, among other things, design capability, construction standards and previous experience. On this basis, the contract was awarded to Ferguson-Ailsa Ltd.

Surplus Food Stocks

Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the most up-to-date estimate of the amount and value of surplus food stocks in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the entire European Economic Community.

Mr. Jopling: On 30 June intervention stocks of beef, breadwheat, butter and skimmed milk powder in the United Kingdom were 341,000 tonnes valued at about £530 million using the buying-in prices valid at that date. The volume of Community stocks of these products at the latest available dates was 6,527,000 tonnes, but these are valued only once a year, on 30 November.

Hops

Mr. Rowe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received any representations for the reintroduction of the Hop Marketing Board.

Mrs. Fenner: I have received no such representations.

Grain Surplus

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the cost of the storage of grain surplus to needs for each of the last three years.

Mr. MacGregor: Expenditure on storage, including handling and other incidental costs, of cereals purchased into intervention in the United Kingdom was as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	19·6
1983-84	30·6
1984-85	*30·4

*Provisional.

Peaches, Apricots, Oranges and Lemons

Mr. Skinner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of (a) peaches, (b) apricots, (c) oranges and (d) lemons, respectively, were destroyed by the European Economic Community in 1983 and 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: Figures for the two latest marketing years for which information is available are as follows:

Commodity	Quantities withdrawn from the market and assumed to be spoilt— '000 tonnes*
	1982-83	1983-84
Peaches	98	170
Apricots	—	50
Oranges	124	477
Lemons	121	382

*Defined as produce not disposed of to one of the outlets provided for in European Community regulations, such as charitable organisations or animal feed.

EC (Intervention Stores)

Mr. Wareing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the refusal of the Home Cereals Authority to accept Merseyside companies offering space for the storage of EEC Intervention Board grain; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985]: Representations have been received from two hon. Members on behalf of employees of the Liverpool Grain Stores which I understand are due to close. In reply, I pointed out that intervention grain must be allocated to the nearest available store, the aim being to limit the cost to the Community budget of transporting surplus grain from the areas of production into store. There are few offerers of grain from the area adjacent to Liverpool and sufficient intervention storage to serve the needs of the north-west of England is already under contract.

EC (Agriculture Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate of the dollar/ecu exchange rate was used in determining the level of agricultural spending contained in the 1986 draft EEC budget.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985]: A rate of 1·2 ecu to the US dollar has been assumed by the Commission in drawing up its preliminary draft budget proposals for agricultural expenditure.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list all categories of agricultural and rural spending or support not included in the 20·6 billion ecu limit on EEC agricultural spending for 1986; and if he will state for each category (a) the level of spending in 1984, (b) the level of spending for 1985 and (c) the estimated level of spending as contained in the 1986 preliminary draft budget;

(2) what assumption regarding the increase in cereal prices was made in deciding on (a) the limit for EEC agricultural spending in 1986 and (b) the 1986 draft budget.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985]: For the purposes of the financial guideline calculation for 1986, it is assumed that EAGGF guarantee expenditure in 1985 will be at the level fixed in the budget. The budget was drawn up on the assumption that the Commission's original price-fixing proposals, including a reduction of 3·6 per cent. in cereal prices, would be agreed. Changes to these proposals will not, however, affect the calculation of the financial guideline as the Commission has undertaken to take any necessary measures to avoid a supplementary budget this year.

I understand that in its preliminary draft budget for 1986 the Commission will assume a cut of 1·8 per cent. in cereal prices for the 1985-86 marketing year, as in the amended proposals from the Commission and Presidency of 16 May.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assumption regarding the increase in cereal prices was made in deciding on (a) the limit for EEC agricultural spending in 1986 and (b) the 1986 draft budget.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 11 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). The figures requested are as follows:

	(mecu)
	EAGGF guidance (except fisheries)	Section IIIB Chapter 38
1984 outturn (provisional)	634	56
1985 budget	632	55
1986 preliminary draft budget	865	Not yet known

Rural areas may also benefit from expenditure under other parts of the Community budget, notably the other structural funds, but the amounts cannot separately be identified.

Dieldrin

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which uses of dieldrin are likely to be approved once the Food and Environment Protection Bill becomes law.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 16 July 1985]: Currently dieldrin has clearance under the pesticides safety precautions scheme for use as an insecticidal lacquer in food storage and for the industrial pre-treatment of timber. With the introduction of statutory controls, all current clearances of pesticides and their uses will be reviewed by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides. I cannot prejudge what advice will be given in respect of any individual chemical or its uses. It has, however, been a principle of Government policy for some years to phase out organochlorine and organomercury compounds as less persistent, efficacious alternatives become available.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what levels of dieldrin were found by the analyses carried out upon the dead herons found on the River Avon near Evesham; and if he will report on the efforts made to locate the source of this pollution.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 16 July 1985]: MAFF laboratory analyses of two heron carcases found on the River Avon near Evesham have revealed dieldrin levels of 19 mg/kg and 54 mg/kg respectively. Residues of DDE and PCBs have also been confirmed.

The sampling programme being carried out by the Severn Trent water authority to determine the source of the residues has yet to be completed.

Industrial Fishing (By-catch Level)

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has been informed by the European Commission that it will recommend an increase in 1986 in the industrial fishing by-catch level.

Mr. MacGregor: The European Commission has submitted a draft regulation to the Council which, if adopted, would have the effect of re-introducing for the period 1 October 1985 to 31 May 1986 a derogation to allow a by-catch of 18 per cent. of whiting in the Norway pout fishery similar to that applying for the same period in 1984-85. The Government does not consider this proposal to be justified and will make this clear in any Council discussions.

Council of Agriculture Ministers (Meeting)

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting in Brussels on 15 and 16 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I represented the United Kingdom at the Agriculture Council on 15-16 July at which Spain and Portugal were present for the first time as observers.

On cereals, the German Minister maintained his opposition to the 1·8 per cent. reduction in support prices for 1985-86. There was no change in the position of other delegations. Moreover, the Commission stated that they had no intention of varying the proposals which were before the Council in June.

With the Council still unable to reach agreement, the Commission stated that it would continue to apply the measures already taken for oilseed rape and durum wheat, and that it would also from 1 August introduce analogous measures for other cereals based on a price abatement of 1·8 per cent. and authorise member states to make an end-of-season payment for common wheat and rye of breadmaking quality in accordance with the proposals that were before the June Council.

The Commission stated its intention under Management Committee procedures to reduce the delay in the payment period for cereals bought into intervention from 120-140 days to 90-120 days which was also in the June proposals; and to operate a special intervention for breadmaking wheat towards the end of the 1985-86 marketing year.

The President said that he intended to keep cereal prices on the agenda for future meetings of the Council with a view to reaching a decision in the autumn. The Commission said that it would bring forward at the beginning of October, proposals for modifying the cereals regime to enable decisions to be taken by the end of 1985. The President and the Commission envisaged that these new proposals may facilitate discussions in the Council.

The Council reached agreement on a directive governing intra-community trade in heat treated milk. This lays down public health and animal health requirements for the production and processing of heat treated milk and the procedures to apply when this is traded between member states. There is provision for member states with high domestic standards, like the United Kingdom, to apply such higher standards to imports as soon as the directive comes into effect on 1 January 1989. This is a very satisfactory outcome; the directive is entirely consistent with the views which our industry put to us. The Council also agreed the minimum import price arrangements for currants, raisins and sultanas to apply from 1 September 1985. Consignments entering the Community up to 9 per cent. below the minimum price will be subject to a graduated levy, the full levy of 22 per cent. only coming into effect at lower prices. In addition, the minimum price in sterling terms will normally not be changed at intervals of less than two months. We would have preferred a three-monthly interval as better suited to our importers needs and I voted against the two month compromise on this ground. But the two month interval will be a major improvement on the one week that applies at present. Overall, we have pressed for and achieved changes in the original proposals which give greater certainty to our traders.

I am pleased to announce also that agreement was reached on an extension of the arrangements for aiding capital investment in animal feed mills in Northern Ireland. This provides an additional 4·5 million ecus over the period to the end of 1987.

I again expressed my concern about the delays in reaching a conclusion over the continued preferential price of gas to Dutch horticultural growers. Mr. Andriessen indicated that the Commission had yesterday made a formal application to the Court on this matter.

The Council agreed a regulation allowing the levels of export restitutions on pasta to be differentiated between destinations.

Mr. Andriessen introduced to the Council the Commission paper on "Perspectives for the Common Agricultural Policy". This is an important document in which the Commission sets out its thoughts as the basis for discussion within the Community. The Council will be discussing this in depth in the autumn.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Central Heating (Additions)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the extent of the financial loss likely to be suffered by the unemployed, sick and disabled as a result of his review of central heating allowance;

(2) if he will monitor the effect of his recent review to ascertain how much benefit will be lost by first time claimants for central heating allowances after 5 August.

Mr. Newton: No-one will have a central heating addition withdrawn as a result of the proposal announced by my right hon. Friend on 18 June: this was that no new awards of these additions should be made with effect from 5 August. The current rates of central heating additions are £2·10 and £4·20 a week, depending on the size of the home.

We have no plans for a specific monitoring exercise on the effects of these changes. Information on central heating additions in payment will however continue to be collected as part of our annual statistical inquiry. I refer the hon. Member to our estimates of the effects of the change in entitlement to these additions contained in my reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan on 1 July at column 61.

A large number of claimants, including many who are long-term sick or disabled, will of course be entitled to heating additions under other provisions, in some cases at a higher rate than either of the central heating additions. As my right hon. Friend also announced on 18 June, all sick and disabled householders receiving the long-term rate of benefit will from November be automatically entitled to at least the lower rate of heating addition.

Mentally Handicapped Children (Hospitals)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what priority he is giving to the issue of children in long-stay mental handicap hospitals in his regional review meetings with regional chairmen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have given and continue to give high priority to this issue. Services for mentally handicapped children are always considered as part of the preparation for each regional review, and are raised at review meetings where appropriate. In 1984 tasks relating to services for mentally handicapped children were set in the action plans for most regions.

Patients Statistics (Hereford)

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing for the Hereford district general hospital for each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, and 1984 the numbers of in patients treated, the numbers of new outpatients, the total numbers of operations performed and the number of knee replacement operations and hip replacement operations performed.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available centrally in precisely the form requested. The available information is given in the table. My hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairman of Herefordshire health authority who may be able to provide the remaining information.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the findings of the management consultants' study commissioned by his Department and undertaken during the first quarter of the current year concerning the character of the market for board and lodging accommodation and the effect on it of supplementary benefit payments.

Mr. Whitney: Copies of the report by Ernst and Whinney on the operation of the ordinary board and lodging market have been placed in the Library today. Copies may be purchased by the public from the Department of Health and Social Security. Room 432 New Court, Carey Street, London WC2A 2LS (price £4).

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has so far received concerning the effects for ordinary board and lodging claimants of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985; and if he will list from whom each has come.

Mr. Whitney: For the latest available information, I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Leeds Central yesterday. A list of correspondence on this subject is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people under the age of 25 years are receiving board and lodging allowances in Lambeth for a period limited to eight weeks.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Derby South on 9 July at column 371.

Pensions

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) men over the age of 65 years and (b) women over the age of 60 years do not qualify for a pension as their contributions fall below 25 per cent. of full contribution; and if he will break these figures down to show how many in each category have paid contributions in the following bands: under 5 per cent., 5 to 10 per cent., 10 to 15 per cent., 15 to 20 per cent. and 20 to 25 per cent.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the number of people who do not qualify for any basic pension because of contribution deficiencies is not recorded centrally. In 1984-85 of 837,000 forms issued to local offices to invite a claim to retirement pension from men and women within four months of pension age 102,000 showed no entitlement to any state retirement pension. This number does not include those people who had no entitlement to basic pension but were entitled to some graduated pension or additional component.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total value of the contributions paid during their working life by (a) men over 65 years and (b) women over 60 years who are not eligible to receive a pension because their contributions fall below the required 25 per cent.; and what is the average contribution paid in each category, since 1955, or such later date as information is available.

Mr. Whitney: This information could not be produced without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women retired at 60 years on a full basic state pension in 1983-84 and 1984-85 respectively.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 66]: In the year ended 31 March 1984, 32,650 women retired at 60 with a 100 per cent. basic pension based on their own contributions. Information for the year 1984-85 is not yet available.

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if Her Majesty's Government will prescribe all repetitive strain injuries, including carpal tunnel syndrome, tennis elbow and frozen shoulder, as industrial diseases for (a) clerical and (b) other workers, respectively, in the telecommunications industry; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The repetition strain injuries writer's cramp and tenosynovitis are already prescribed. Carpal tunnel syndrome is also covered if it occurs as a result of tenosynovitis. The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council, which advises the Government on the prescribed diseases, considered repetition strain injuries, including carpal tunnel syndrome, epicondylitis of the humerus (tennis elbow) and rotator cuff syndrome (frozen shoulder), in its 1981 "Review of the schedule of prescribed diseases" (Cmnd. 8393, paragraphs 51-55). In 1983 the council studied two of these conditions, epicondylitis of the humerus and rotator cuff syndrome, in more detail. This report was not published but copies are available in the Library. Both reports decided against widening the terms of prescription for these conditions, because they were common in the general population and there was insufficient evidence to link them with specific occupational groups. However, the council is keeping the evidence on repetition strain injuries under review.

Child Benefit

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the additional cost of raising child benefits in line with other benefits rather than only two per cent. this November.

Mr. Whitney: It would cost an additional £175 million in a full year to increase child benefit in line with the increase in the retail price index over the 12 months to May 1985.

Benefits

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make arrangements to provide claimants whose applications for social security benefits are refused with the names and addresses of local agencies offering advice and information about social security benefits.

Mr. Newton: All forms and letters conveying an adjudication officer's adverse decision in cases where there is a right of appeal are being amended to include a section referring to the availability of advice from such bodies as the Citizens Advice Bureau or local law centre, and indicating where their addresses and telephone numbers can be found.

In board and lodging cases where supplementary benefit is being restricted as a result of recent changes in the regulations, local offices are including lists of the names, addresses and telephone numbers of local agencies, in addition to the local DHSS office itself, that may be able to give further advice.

Dentistry (Sterilisation Methods)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue new guidelines to dentists about sterilisation methods of dental instruments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities provide adequate facilities for sterilisation of instruments for the use of dentists in the hospital and community dental services. We have issued comprehensive advice on sterilisation to all dentists, including those in the general dental service, in the report of the expert group on hepatitis in dentistry.

Population Statistics

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate for Government expenditure on state pensions in (a) 1991, (b) 1996 and (c) 2001.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1985, c. 104]: The figures requested are as follows:

Estimated expenditure on state retirement pensions

	£ billion
1991-92	17½
1996-97	18½
2001-02	20¼

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many fully qualified supervisory officers are employed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on site supervision work;

(2) how many unqualified supervisory officers are employed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on site supervision work.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Gentleman.

Armagh Prison (Strip Searches)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will meet ex-prisoners from Armagh prison and relatives of current prisoners to discuss their complaints concerning strip searches in the prison.

Mr. Scott: No.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a young offender suffered an epileptic fit while being stripped naked in Armagh prison on 31 December 1984.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing for each district of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board the number of people on waiting lists for each specialty for the last three years for which figures are available, together with the average length of time a patient had to wait.

Mr. Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Central Reference Library, Belfast

Rev. Ian Paisley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if the Department of Education has specified to the Belfast education and library board the sum to be allocated to the Belfast central reference library;

(2) whether special financial provision is made to the Belfast central reference library to take account of its responsibilities for providing reference facilities for the whole province;

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that all the money allocated to the Belfast central reference library is spent on that particular library.

Mr. Scott: While the Department of Education for Northern Ireland in determining the financial allocations for the education and library boards does take account of the reference facilities provided by the Belfast central library for Northern Ireland as a whole, it does not specifically earmark funds for this purpose within the resources made available for the Belfast board.

It is a matter for each board to determine its own priorities for the services for which it has a responsibility, including the library service, and allocate funds accordingly.

TRANSPORT

DVLC, Swansea

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what check is made on identity when new licence holders are registered into Swansea vehicle licensing centre;

(2) what proposals he has to change the basis of registration of vehicles at Swansea vehicle licensing centre;

(3) what check is made to eliminate previous keepers when new owners or keepers of vehicles are registered in Swansea; and what notification is given to the original ones.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Seven million used vehicles change hands every year and carrying out a full check on keepership in every case would make the process of buying and selling vehicles much less convenient for motorists as well as adding significantly to costs to the Department and thus to the public. Special checks are already made when a vehicle is reported as stolen and the new computer now being installed at Swansea will open up possibilities to strengthen these safeguards. I am proposing to review the registration system as the new computer becomes fully operational. Full account will also be taken of the views of the police.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proof of ownership is required for registration of vehicles with the Swansea vehicle licensing centre.

Mr. Michael Spicer: DVLC maintains a register of vehicle keepers not vehicle owners. No proof of ownership is therefore required when a vehicle is registered at the centre.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the difference between owner and keeper for the purpose of registration of cars at the Swansea vehicle licensing centre.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The keeper of a vehicle is the person who normally uses it on the public road. The police will usually want to contact the keeper in the investigation of an offence and the keeper is also most likely to be responsible for taxing the vehicle. The owner of a vehicle could be a hire purchase company or a large business concern and the recording of this information at DVLC would be less useful for police or departmental purposes.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether registration of a vehicle at Swansea vehicle licensing centre is proof of ownership for the purposes of his Department.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The registration of a vehicle at DVLC does not constitute proof of ownership. A prominent note on the front of the vehicle registration document makes clear that the registered keeper is not necessarily the legal owner. We will shortly be mounting a publicity campaign to remind motorists of the need to check other documentation—for instance a bill of sale—before buying a used car.

Commuter Services

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any information as to how many private operators who set up commuter services in London under the Transport Act 1980 were still in operation one year later.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information in the form requested could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

British Airways (Aircraft Purchases)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many British-made aircraft have been purchased by British Airways in the past 10 years.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I understand from British Airways that it has purchased or leased 20 British-made aircraft during the past 10 years. In addition, it bought Rolls Royce engines worth over £230 million for use on other aircraft during this period.

Road Signs

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the junction signpost 33 on the M1 motorway northbound to Sheffield and Rotherham was reported damaged; and when it will be painted and repaired.

Mr. Ridley: There is no record of the date when damage to the signpost was first reported. A new sign will be installed as part of the current M1 maintenance scheme between junctions 32 and 33.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what date the junction signposts 31, 32 and 33 on the northbound section of the M1 motorway between London and Wakefield were last painted and maintained.

Mr. Ridley: Motorway sign plates are not repainted. Replacement signing work was carried out on M1 at junction 32 during the first week of July this year. Other signs between junctions 31 and 33 which need attention will be dealt with during the current financial year.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport when road sign maintenance was last carried out on the signpost at junctions 10, 11 and 12 on the M1 northbound between London and Wakefield.

Mr. Ridley: The signs have been inspected regularly and some cleaning has been carried out. They are however now reaching the end of their useful life. Those at junctions 11 and 12 are due for renewal later this financial year and the need for replacement of those at junction 10 is under review.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy with reference to periodical inspection of all motorway signs.

Mr. Ridley: Arrangements for the periodical inspection of motorway signs are described in the code of practice for the routine maintenance of motorway and all purpose trunk roads. A copy of the code is in the Library.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will identify each respective authority responsible for the repair and maintenance of M1 motorway road signs between London and Wakefield.

Mr. Ridley: The following local authorities, acting as the Department's agents are responsible for the repair and maintenance of road signs on the M1 motorway between London and Wakefield:

London borough of Barnet County Councils of—Hertfordshire
Bedfordshire
Buckinghamshire
Northamptonshire
Leicestershire
Nottinghamshire
Derbyshire
South Yorkshire
West Yorkshire

Bottesford (Bypass)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest position regarding the announcement of a date for a public inquiry into the A52 proposed bypass around Bottesford, Leicestershire.

Mrs. Chalker: Draft orders for Bottesford bypass are due to be published in a few weeks. If, after publication, there are any outstanding unresolved objections, we will hold a public inquiry probably in the spring of 1986. Details will be announced about two months beforehand.

A47 Wardley Hill

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce his decision on the public inquiry into the A47 Wardley Hill improvement scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: We have received the report of the inspector who held a public inquiry in April and I hope to announce a decision within the next two months.

Glaston (Bypass)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will add a bypass around Glaston, Rutland, Leicestershire, on the A47 trunk road, to the preparation pool.

Mrs. Chalker: A route assessment report for the A47 trunk road in Leicestershire has recently been completed, and Glaston is one of the candidates under consideration for inclusion in our regional programme for small schemes.

MV Bridgeness

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), Official Report, 27 June, column 464, whether the surveyor appointed to inquire into all the circumstances of the grounding of the MV Bridgeness on 16 June, will also be inquiring into remedial measures to control oil pollution taken immediately after the grounding.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, that was outside the scope of his inquiry. However, in view of widespread concern about the clean-up response at sea, I have agreed that a departmental report should be prepared and published on the measures taken.

Singapore International Airlines

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any indication from the Singapore Government of their satisfaction with the implementation of the agreement which was concluded during consultations in May for the provision of air services to Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There is no reason to suppose that the Singapore Government are other than satisfied with the implementation of this agreement, which is proceeding normally.

Company Cars

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the number of company cars in 1960, 1970 and in each year since 1974; and what proportion this represented of the total number of cars in each year.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 16 July 1985]: Figures for the number of cars registered in company names are not available before 1980. The information requested from that date is as follows:

Year	Total No. of Licensed Cars and Light Vans	No. of Cars Registered in Company Names	Proportion of Total
			per cent.
1980	15,072,000	1,748,000	11·6
1981	15,266,000	1,794,000	11·8
1982	15,685,000	1,813,000	11·5
1983	15,854,000	1,814,000	11·6
1984	16,399,000	1,917,000	11·7

It is estimated that a further 3 per cent. of all cars are registered in the name of a private individual but owned by a company.

Roads

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the amount spent by local authorities in each of the last 12 years on (a) maintenance and repair of roads and (b) new road building expressed at constant prices.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 16 July 1985]: The amounts, for England at 1982-83 prices, are:

	Maintenance £ million	Capital £ million
1973-74	923	1,031
1974-75	905	724
1975-76	899	665
1976-77	859	661
1977-78	816	451
1978-79	872	403

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

W. B. Gurney and Sons (Exhibition)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the work of W. B. Gurney and Sons to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Tebbit: Arrangements have been made for such an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall to take place from 21 October 1985 to 25 October 1985.

Broadcasting Organisations (Programme Schedules)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about alleged anti-competitive practices by broadcasting organisations in relation to restrictions placed by them on the publication of programme schedules in newspapers and magazines other than those sponsored by those broadcasting organisations; when he expects to receive the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: I have received no representations since the matter was referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The commission is required to report on the reference by 28 July.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the future of the loan guarantee scheme; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: My Department receives frequent comments on the loan guarantee scheme from small businesses and representative organisations. Close contact is also maintained with the participating lending institutions. Most comments received are in favour of loan guarantee arrangements, but some representations suggest improvements in the terms of the scheme. I shall take account of these comments when reviewing the future of the arrangements.

Warren Spring Laboratory

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what factors he based his decision to meet only half the cost of the £200,000 a year advisory service on profitable ways to recycle waste to be established at the Warren Spring laboratory in Hertfordshire.

Mr. Pattie: It is most important that the work of the unit to be formed at Warren Spring laboratory is of a direct relevance to industrial needs. This can best be achieved by involving industry both in the formulation of the work of the unit and in its cost. Furthermore it is entirely appropriate that industry, one of the main potential beneficiaries from the expertise at Warren Spring laboratory, should contribute to their programme. Such a contribution is entirely in accord with the general support policies of my Department.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which was the organisation that made an offer to his Department to purchase the Warren Spring laboratory in Hertfordshire after his original announcement of his intention to sell it off to the private sector.

Mr. Pattie: A number of approaches were made to my Department last year by organisations expressing an interest in Warren Spring laboratory and it would not be appropriate for me to give information about those organisations or their interests, which I must regard as commercially confidential.

Product Liability

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what reservations Her Majesty's Government hold about the scope of the European Community directive on product liability; what consultations on the matter have taken place with the European Commission, food processors and consumers' organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: We do not hold any reservations about the scope of this proposed directive. Consulations with all concerned about the directive and its scope have been carried out on a number of occasions in the nine years since the first draft of the directive was put forward. We now hope that the directive will be adopted as soon as possible.

Manufactures (British Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the market for manufactured goods within the original six members of the European Economic Community was taken up by British exports in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what was the comparable percentage in 1973.

Mr. Channon: In 1984, the United Kingdom accounted for an estimated 6·9 per cent. of the imports of manufactures by the original six members of the European Community. The comparable figure for 1973 was 6 per cent.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of regulations, industrial practices or aids to industry of any kind, which have had to be cleared with, or which have been challenged by, the European Economic Community Commission since May 1979 as being inconsistent with the United Kingdom's obligations under the treaty of Rome, together with the outcome.

Mr. Channon: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Exchange Risk Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Howard asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Government's review of the exchange risk guarantee scheme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On 29 March, I announced that the review was nearly complete. The Government have now decided, in view of the increase in the scheme's costs in recent years, the unpredictability of future liabilities, and the availability of other sources of finance, that the scheme should be targeted more cost-effectively in line with the Government's regional policy objectives. The following arrangements take effect from today, subject to suitable transitional provisions.

(a) Exchange risk cover will no longer be available on loans provided by the European Investment Bank (EIB);

(b) Exchange risk cover for loans from the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) will be limited to a maximum of £500,000 or each supported project;

(c) The sterling interest rate for ECSC finance enjoying cover will be increased from 3 per cent. below the broadly commercial rate (as used under the Industrial Development Act 1982) to 2 per cent. below the broadly commercial rate, subject to charging a minimum premium of 1 per cent.

It sould be remembered that companies dealing with the EIB and ECSC are creditworthy enterprises, often backed by third party guarantees, who can generally raise finance on the commercial money markets. In addition, the Government's regional selective assistance grants are available to worthwhile projects in the assisted areas that require assistance to enable them to proceed.

As well as taking advantage of the Government's facilities, it is opeen to United Kingdom firms to seek EIB and ECSC loan finance in sterling, thus avoiding contingent liabilities for possible exchange losses. Alternatively, they can if they wish seek foreign currency loans with or without measures to reduce exposure to risk. I hope that United Kingdom companies will take full advantage of these European opportunities, within the limits of what is available.

The Government will be prepared to provide cover under the terms of the previous scheme to eligible cases submitted to it before the date of this announcement, and will discuss suitable transitional arrangements with the scheme's agents in respect of their cases.

Vehicle Exhaust Emission

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated cost to the consumer of full implementation of the European Economic Community requirement on car exhaust emission of (i) a 1·6 litre car and (ii) a 2·5 litre car, including purchase price and running cost.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 15 July, c. 6.]: The newly agreed Community standard for medium size cars cannot be implemented before October 1991 (new type approvals) and October 1993 (new registrations). It is not yet possible to calculate the cost of implementation with any degree of assurance. Whilst it is hoped that lean burn engines now under development, fitted with an efficient oxidation catalyst, will be able to meet the standard by 1991 it may be necessary to resort to three-way catalyst technology in some cases. Costs on the lean burn route depend on the ignition, fuelling and other equipment used to meet the emission limits without compromising performance and fuel consumption, but would be lower (if that technology can reach the standard in time) than the less efficient catalyser system.

The newly agreed Community standard for large cars, will, for the foreseeable future, require the use of the three-way catalyst system as already developed for the US market. This would add about £500 to the pre-tax purchase price of a 2·5 litre car, and reduce its fuel economy by around 10 per cent.

The Government do not intend to impose standards on vehicles sold or used in the United Kingdom which would not be cost-effective, or would have the effect of requiring manufacturers to use three-way catalyst technology rather than more cost-effective systems.

ENVIRONMENT

Football

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the football authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I met the Football Association and the Football League in my working group on measures to combat football hooliganism on 17 July. We continued the discussions between the Government and the football authorities on measures to be taken, jointly and separately, to deal with the problems of crowd control and safety confronting the game. The Football League presented a memorandum and reported specifically on membership cards.

The issue of membership cards is one which concerns the responsibility of football clubs for ensuring safety and security within their own premises. The Government expect them to take that responsibility seriously, and regret the delay. I am glad to note that the Football League has established a working group to give this option the full but speedy consideration it requires. I look forward to seeing an early report, which will be completed by early September.

In the meantime, a Government-football authorities package is being constructed for the new season. The Government have already announced a range of actions, within their responsibilities, to reduce and contain hooliganism. The police role should be strengthened in particular with new powers to be proposed under the Public Order Bill to be introduced next Session. I hope that Parliament will approve our legislation to restrict alcohol at matches and on journeys to and from them; we know alcohol can incite and inflame trouble. I took the initiative to agree binding measures with European Governments and with UEFA. A convention has been agreed upon and should be adopted very soon; discussions have started with UEFA. To meet public concern about safety, divisions 3 and 4 Football League clubs are to be designated under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act; chief fire officers have been inspecting all sports grounds; and there is a full inquiry under Mr. Justice Popplewell. His interim report will be available very soon.

The football authorities are developing plans for more all-ticket and morning matches. Known hooligans will be banned from grounds. CCTV will be installed quickly at as many grounds as possible. Problem matches are being identified early so that effective precautions can be taken.

The resolve and the effort are there. The Government are determined that all possible steps will be taken to restore the good name of football and our country. Our discussions of possible actions with the Football Association and the Football League will continue with the same sense of urgency.

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what activities his Department plans to arrange to mark the United Nations International Year of Shelter for the Homeless in 1987.

Sir George Young: Since the focus of the year is on assistance to developing countries, action to mark it is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Widdicombe Interim Report

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the Widdicombe interim report regarding advertising and other forms of publicity by local authorities.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the interim report of the Widdicombe committee; and what arrangements he will make to publish it.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) on 17 July.

Consent Applications

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under each of section 7, section 8 and section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act have now been refused for each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is as follows:

Authority	Section 7	Section 8
Greater London Council	3	—
Greater Manchester Council	1	3
Totals	4	3

No application under section 9 has been refused consent.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the longest period a case submitted under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act has remained with his Department before consent was given.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Two hundred and thirty two days. This case was held in abeyance pending resolution of the authority's related request for financial assistance.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many consent applications have been received under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council;

(2) how many consent applications have now been received under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is set out in the table.

Authority	Section 7	Section 8
Greater London council	186	2,257
Inner London education authority	24	707
Greater Manchester council	20	630

Tyne and Wear county council	366	218
West Midlands county council	61	591
West Yorkshire county council	15	261
Total	720	5,373

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff are employed by his Department to process consent applicationa under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act; and what are their grades.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Details of Department of the Environment staff employed on administering specific applications for consent under section 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government Act 1984 and sections 91, 92 and 93 of the Local Government Act 1985 are set out in the following table:

Grade	Estimated full-time equivalents

Clerical Officer—Clerical Assistant	5·30
Total	14·6

These figures exclude related typing and messengerial staff.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will grant a general consent for all projects, excluding the enterprise boards, funded under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, from the provisions of section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A number of general consents have been issued under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984. Any other applications for general or specific consent from the GLC or the metropolitan county councils will be considered carefully and on their merits.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each consent applied for under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act by the Greater London council and each of the metropolitan county councils and give the date the application was made, together where appropriate with the date on which consent was granted.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon Member to my answer of 3 June 1985, at column 54. Updated information could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each consent applied for citing sections 92 and 93 of the Local Government Act 1985 by the Greater London Council and each of the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the delays in granting consent on certain disposals submitted by the Greater London council under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon Member to my answer of 16 July 1985, at column 79.

American Bar Association

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many staff in the House have been occupied in preparing Westminster Hall and other facilities for the American Bar Association's function;

(2) what is the cost of preparing Westminster Hall for the American Bar Association's functions to be held there;

(3) how much money has been paid by the American Bar Association for the preparation of Westminister Hall for its function.

Sir George Young: 26 staff of the Property Services Agency were involved in the preparations. I have no information relating to staff of the two Houses, which is a matter for the authorities of those Houses. The estimated cost, including PSA's staff costs, of preparing Westminster Hall is £22,250 and this sum is to be refunded in full by the American Bar Association.

Palace of Westminster (Pesticides and Herbicides)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what pesticides and herbicides are used inside the grounds of the Palace of Westminster.

Sir George Young: The only herbicide or pesticide used on the grounds of the Palace is for control of algae on gravel paths in New Palace Yard and on Cromwell Green. It is a contact herbicide, in the form of a sodium salt, which can be bought in most garden shops. Its main constituent is dichlorophen. Within the Palace itself appropriate pesticides are used in the kitchens when necessary by specialist contractors brought in from time to time as and when the need arises.

Housing Stock

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest estimate of the money required by local authorities in England and Wales to bring their housing stock up to decent standards.

Sir George Young: On 11 April my Department launched an inquiry into the condition of local authority housing stock, in order to establish how much local authorities estimate needs to be spent to put their stock into good condition. Their responses are now being analysed and first results should be available by the end of this month.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how much grant aid his Department has provided through the Countryside Commission to owners and occupiers of land in areas of outstanding natural beauty; and what was the corresponding figure three years ago;

(2) how much grant aid his Department has provided through the Countryside Commission to local authorities to cover expenditure in areas of outstanding natural beauty; and what was the corresponding figure three years ago.

Mr. Waldegrave: Total expenditure by the Countryside Commission on grants to private individuals, and to organisations and local authorities and public bodies throughout the countryside for the years 1981-82 and 1984-85 was as follows:

	£million 1981-82	£million 1984-85
Private	1·9	2·6
Public	5·1	5·3

The figures for 1984-85 are provisional and subject to audit.

The commission does not record figures separately for expenditure in areas of outstanding natural beauty, nor does it distinguish between landowners and other private persons or between local authorities and other public bodies.

Water Quality

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce before 26 July his decision on applications to the European Community for derogations or time limits in respect of the European Economic Community directive on water quality; and if he will publish the derogations and time limits.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to promote public access to information on environmental water quality.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is tomorrow issuing a circular concerning the form, content and availability of public registers of data on discharges to surface and underground waters and related information on the licences under which they are made and on environmental water quality.

The registers are to be maintained by water pollution control authorities in accordance with the regulations laid before this House on 5 June and to be open to the public from 31 July.

Establishment of the registers substantially completes the Government's programme for implementing the main provisions of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, and will further strengthen the framework available for promoting our objectives for the maintenance and improvement of water quality.

The opening of the registers will mark an important step forward in accountability and access to information on environmental matters and one which will, I believe, be widely welcomed by water authorities, industry and environmental interests.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many persons are currently housed under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

Sir George Young: During 1984 local authorities accepted responsibility for securing accommodation for some 83,000 households under the Act. Figures for earlier years are available in the Library.

North Sea Pollution (Intergovernmental Conference)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the United Kingdom intends to host the next intergovernmental conference on pollution in the North sea.

Mr. Waldegrave: As I announced at the international conference on the protection of the North sea in Bremen last year, the United Kingdom will host a second conference in 1986 or 1987. I expect to announce a firm date soon.

Housing Associations (Exhibition)

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the work of the housing association movement to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Gow: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 22 July to Friday 26 July.

EMPLOYMENT

Gas Appliances

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the safe installation of gas appliances.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is evidence of an improvement in the level of gas safety over the past few years. We are anxious further to reduce the risks. The chairman of the Health and Safety Commission has told me that in the commission's view the greatest risk arises from installation downstream of the service pipe. One of the major tasks is ensuring adequate standards of competence of gas installers. The Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1984 require competence in installation work. Precise requirements have not been defined. The commission considers that an essential step is to set standards for training. These can be widely promulgated as well as provising a legal framework.

The commission has asked the Health and Safety Executive to bring together a panel of experts, including representatives from the gas industry, to develop an approved code of practice on standards of training for gas installers, under the Health and Safety at Work Act etc. 1974, which will also provide evidence for the better definition of requirements for competence. The text will be considered by representatives of gas consumers and the trade unions, and will be issued next year, after publication for consultation.

The commission does not at present consider that the addition of mandatory registration could achieve much that would not be effectively brought about by firmer training and competence requirements; and if would in addition impose a bureaucratic and costly system on the large number of installers — costs which would be passed on to the numerous consumer population in the form of higher charges, with the result that poorer ones would be even less likely to call in installers for essential servicing. The commission advise, however, that this is an option which might be considered if, for instance, the balance of risk were to change and the recent encouraging trend were reversed.

Training Organisations

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will provide figures showing the overall operating budgets of industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations in 1984-85, distinguishing industry funding from Manpower Services Commission funding;

(2) if he will give figures for the number of staff employed by industry training boards in 1979 and by industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations together in 1984, broken down into permanent staff and staff funded on a 12 month basis by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 418]: Training in sectors of industry covered by non-statutory training arrangements is the responsibility of employers in those sectors and financial and manpower information relating to them is not collected centrally by the Manpower Services Commission. The table shows figures for the numbers of staff employed by the seven industry training boards currently operating. The other information requested is either not available or could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

TRANSPORT

British Rail Engineering Ltd. (Employment)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many jobs have been lost by British Rail Engineering Ltd. since 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail Engineering Ltd. currently employs about 10,300 fewer men than it did in January 1979.

Motorways (Litter)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has placed any restrictions on the removal of litter debris by local authorities from motorway verges.

Mrs. Chalker: Local authorities who carry out routine maintenance of motorways on our behalf are guided by the recently published code of practice for routine maintenance for motorways and all-purpose trunk roads, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The code is designed to ensure consistent and safe maintenance standards. The basic provision for the clearance of litter may be varied on safety grounds or where litter is a particular problem.

Ship Repair Work (Trinity House)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what ship repair work on behalf of Trinity House has been placed with British shipyards over each of the last three years.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter for Trinity House to decide, but I understand that in each of the last three years five lighthouse tenders have used British shipyards for dry docking and repair. In addition, 10 of their major floating aids have also been serviced and repaired each year in British shipyards.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to introduce to ensure that the work of the existing metropolitan county council and the Greater London council accident investigation and analysis units continues if the Local Government Bill is enacted.

Mrs. Chalker: It is for successor authorities to decide on what arrangements they wish to make to continue the work of accident investigation and analysis units. The Department has issued advice to London boroughs and metropolitan district councils and stands ready to offer further advice and assistance.

Under the Local Government Act 1985 the residuary bodies have been given a duty to ascertain from successor authorities what professional and technical services they wish to see continued, and if necessary to enter into agreements with those authorities to maintain the services until permanent arrangements are settled. Successor authorities will want to consider the arrangements for accident investigation and prevention, including the link with traffic and accident data banks, and then decide whether these activities should be undertaken by the appropriate residuary body or by a lead district council or London borough.

Sidcup Bypass

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was his projected date for the opening of the A20 Sidcup bypass; what is now the likely date of completion; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: When the award of the contract was announced last February, the bypass improvement was expected to be completed in the spring of 1988. That is still our expectation.

Chelmsford Bypass

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the projected date for the opening of the A12 Chelmsford bypass; what is now the likely date of completion; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The contract completion date remains 21 September 1986, but meeting this will depend on the weather and unforeseen circumstances.

Heavy Lorries

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport which of the recommendations of the Armitage report on "Lorries, People and the Environment," have been superseded by other decisions of his Department; what those decisions were; and when they took place.

Mr. Ridley: The White Paper on the Armitage report (Cmnd. 8439) remains the document on which my policy on lorries, people and the environment is based.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport which of the recommendations of the Armitage report on "Lorries, People and the Environment", he has implemented; and when they were implemented.

Mr. Ridley: Since my hon. Friend last reported on 3 April 1984 on progress on implementation of measures in response to the Armitage report a further 25 bypasses have been added to the trunk road programme with 177 in preparation or under construction that spray suppression equipment should be fitted to new trailers was effective from 1 May 1985. Work on further noise reduction is continuing. Motoring taxes (VED and fuel duty) on lorries as a whole have exceeded road track costs by a substantial margin since before 1980 and those on each class of lorry have done so since March 1985. VED rates on lorries below 12 tonnes have been reduced by 19 per cent. to 24 per cent. since 1982 and the emphasis of taxation has been shifted each year towards the heaviest lorries. The position on the 58 main recommendations can be summarised as:

51 accepted (5 in part); of these:
38 recommendations have been implemented
9 are being implemented
4 are addressed not to Goverment but to local authorities and hauliers.

London Regional Transport

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made by London Regional Transport in achieving the objectives set for it last July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Shortly after the establishment of London Regional Transport on 29 June 1984, I set its chairman, Dr. Keith Bright, objectives in four crucial areas — reducing costs and the call on taxpayers' and ratepayers' money; improving management through the estabishment of smaller and more efficient units; involving the private sector; and improving services within the resources available. I am glad to say that, in the course of only 12 months, LRT has set in train radical changes in the way its business is managed, as a result of which it has made substantial progress towards these objectives.

In its first year, LRT expects to exceed its target of reducing real unit costs by 2½ per cent. per annum. This is good news for Londoners. LRT's achievement here means that revenue support will be reduced in 1985-86 by £60 million compared with the GLC's budget for 1984-85 without excessive increases in fares or major cuts in services. This will enable over £40 million more to be made available in grants for capital projects in the current financial year than the GLC proposed for 1984-85. LRT has made a good start towards achieving its task of halving the level of revenue support, from £190 million in 1984-85 to £95 million in 1987-88.

LRT has now formed subsidiary companies for its bus and underground businesses and for bus engineering. This will increase management accountability and improve LRT's cost-effectiveness. The LRT Act also required LRT to invite tenders for the provision of services on its behalf. An early example of this — the tendering of 12 bus routes — will reduce by £¾ million the annual subsidy bill of £4 million for these routes, while annual mileage operated on the 12 routes will be increased by 2½ per cent. LRT has recently announced the tendering of about 40 more bus routes.

In our proposals for LRT, we made clear that we wanted to see closer co-operation with British Rail. I set up the London passenger transport group last July, with the chairmen of LRT and BR, to keep a regular watch on this. The decision to proceed with capitalcard—the combined travelcard for LRT bus, underground and BR rail services in Greater London—was an early result. Capitalcard has been a resounding success. Over 100,000 users are expected by the end of the year.

A further example of increased co-operation between LRT and BR is demonstrated in their proposals for improvements to interchanges. A programme of schemes is being developed, designed to help passengers changing from one public transport mode to another.

In my objectives for LRT, I asked it to keep in mind the needs of disabled people. It has set up a new unit to work full-time on initiatives for disabled passengers. Its recent statement, "Transport for disabled People: The LRT approach", shows how seriously it is taking its responsibilities towards disabled people. The new buses to be ordered by London Buses Ltd. from 1986 onwards will be the first to incorporate new design features which will improve access for elderly and less mobile people.

The Government's recent decision to endorse LRT's proposals for investment in a new ticketing system for London's underground will save money and streamline the operation of the system, making it more convenient for passengers.

The past year has also seen the letting of the contract for the docklands light railway, an important component in the strategy for revitalising London's docklands. I look forward to seeing the railway in operation by July 1987.

I am pleased with the excellent start LRT has made in its first year and I am confident that this progress will be maintained.

Leeds and Liverpool Canal

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department proposes to provide any financial assistance towards the scheme to revitalise the Leeds and Liverpool canal in Lancashire.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to the reply, 15 July 1985, c. 29]: I have been asked to reply. Whilst a scheme for the revitalisation of the Leeds and Liverpool canal is known to be under consideration locally in Lancashire, no firm proposals have yet been put forward. I cannot therefore say whether any financial assistance would be available.

ENERGY

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of regulations or aids and practices within the energy field which have to be cleared with, or which have been challenged by the European Economic Community Commission since May 1979 under the European Economic Community treaties, together with the outcome.

Mr. Peter Walker: The following regulations, aids and practices are cleared with the European Economic Community Commission:

—Information relating to plans to dispose of radioactive waste
—State Aids for Coal
—Breaches of EC oil stocking obligations
—New formal bilateral oil stocking arrangements with other Member States

There is general accord with the European Community on energy matters, and such procedures as are necessary and appropriate are usually completed expeditiously and satisfactorily.

WALES

Long-Stay Hospitals

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of persons aged between 16 and 21 years who are currently resident in long-stay mental hospitals in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of persons aged between 16 and 21 years who were resident in mental hospitals and units on 5 April 1985 is provisionally estimated to have been 163. Of these, 118 were resident in mental handicap hospitals/units and 45 in mental illness hospitals/units.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many persons, who had been immediately previously resident for a period in excess of 12 months in long-stay hospitals in Wales, have over the past 12 months been brought out of such hospitals to reside within the community.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of persons discharged from mental hospitals and units during 1984 to reside in the community, having immediately previously been resident in an institution for over 12 months, is estimated to have been 185. Of these, 142 were discharged from mental illness hospitals/units and 43 from mental handicap hospitals/units.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the joint funding projects in Wales geared to helping integrate persons resident in long-stay mental hospitals into the community, indicating those authorities involved in such schemes and the amount of funding associated with each project.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The schemes listed below either fully offer places in the community to patients from long-stay mental hospitals or are projects capable of so doing.

In addition, the all Wales strategy for the development of services for the mentally handicapped places emphasis on community based initiatives. An additional £5 million is available in 1985-86 increasing annually to £28 million at current prices in 1992-93 which is mainly allocated for developments in line with county plans.

Farmers

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many farmers there were in Wales in each year since 1978.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Estimates of the numbers of farmers, partners and directors doing farm work on agricultural holdings in Wales are as follows:

	Numbers
1978	34,900
1979	35,200
1980	34,300
1981	34,700
1982	34,600
1983	33,200
1984	35,700

These estimates are based on the annual June censuses of statistically significant holdings. A more detailed analysis of the farm labour force up to 1983 is given in table 4.01 of "Welsh Agricultural Statistics No. 6, 1984", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Cwmbran Development Corporation

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is to happen to the industrial assets of Cwmbran development corporation when that body is wound up.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As part of the Government's policy of reducing public sector borrowing, the corporation is expected to take all reasonable steps to dispose of its assets to the private sector. However, I have decided that any residual industrial assets should be transferred to the Welsh development agency. Discussions have been held with Cwmbran development corporation and the WDA and it has been agreed that the transfer should take place on 30 September 1987.

"Local Choice in Public Transport"

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has considered the responses he has received to the consultation paper, "Local Choice in Public Transport"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The consultation paper was issued to stimulate debate and discussion in the principality about local authority involvement in local rail services and the possibility of providing more effective support for important local rail services about which there was concern at the time. There was a very full response from local authorities in Wales as well as from organisations and individuals with an interest in public transport matters. The main suggestion put forward in the paper was that county councils might in future become more directly involved in financing certain local rail services. There was considerable support for the principle of local involvement, but the idea that county councils might in future take over responsibility for providing revenue support for services on a number of local lines was not generally welcomed.

A particular concern of respondents was that the practical difficulties arising from this transfer of responsibilities (difficulties to which the consultation paper itself drew attention) would outweigh the advantages. I have considered all the responses very carefully, including the report prepared by the committee on Welsh affairs. The conclusion I have reached is that, given the views expressed, the idea of making county councils responsible for providing revenue support for certain local rail services should not be pursued. The consultation focused attention on the importance that a wide cross section of people and organisations in Wales attach to the Welsh rail network.

Local authorities already have powers to provide financial and other assistance to British Rail in certain circumstances. I very much welcome the fact that there has been an increase in the scale and number of cases in which Welsh local authorities have co-operated with British Rail to provide improved services or facilities; and more initiatives of this nature are planned. As a result of the co-operative efforts of British Rail, local authorities, Government agencies and the Welsh Office services have been improved and costs reduced on the Shrewsbury to Aberystwyth, Cambrian coast and central Wales lines.

In the light of these developments and the comments I have received on the consultation paper I am satisfied that the development of an increased partnership between local authorities and British Rail using existing powers offers the best way of helping to secure the future of Welsh railways and of achieving the increased local involvement that so many people want. I shall therefore be writing to all local authorities in Wales reminding them of the powers that are available and urging them to consider how they might make use of these in future. I am sure BR will welcome the opportunity to work more closely with Welsh authorities and to build on the successful joint initiatives that are already being taken.

PRIME MINISTER

Pay Review Bodies

Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the reports of the pay review bodies.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 6 June 1985, col. 194-6]: Report No. 22 of the Top Salaries Review Body, which recommends new salary rates as from 1 April 1985 for senior civil servants, senior officers of the armed forces, and members of the judiciary, is being laid before Parliament as a Command Paper this afternoon. Copies will be available in the Vote Office.

The review body has on this occasion undertaken a comprehensive review not only of the salary levels of the groups concerned but also of the salary structures. It is for this reason that the review body's report has, by agreement with the Government, been delivered rather longer after the date to which the recommendations relate (1 April 1985) than usual. I should like to put on record the Government's gratitude to the chairman and the other members of the review body for the care and thoroughness with which their conclusions and recommendations have been prepared.

For senior civil servants the review body has recommended certain changes in the salary structure with a view to introducing into the pay arrangements at these levels a greater degree of flexibility to take account of differences of performance and of job weight, and of other factors such as, for example, the state of the market for particular appointments. In particular, it has recommended:

> a greater degree of salary differentiation in grade 1 (permanent secretaries) by reference to broad considerations of job weight;
> the introduction of incremental scales, including some discretionary increments to be awarded for high performance, for grades 2 and 3 (deputy and under secretaries and equivalents);
> the consolidation of London weighting into grade 3 pay.

In formulating its recommendations on salary levels for senior civil servants, the review body has taken into consideration such evidence as it has been able to gather on recruitment, retention, motivation and morale, and rewards available at comparable levels of responsibility in other walks of life. It has also taken into account the importance of being able to offer a reasonable career structure, in terms of salary, in order to achieve an adequate supply of people of the right quality to fill the top posts in the public service. Its consideration of these matters has led the review body to recommend a widening of differentials for the senior civil service which would entail substantial increases of remuneration at the top levels, though it would still leave those levels well below the salary levels of people at comparable levels and with broadly comparable responsibilities in the private sector.

Similar considerations have been taken into account in arriving at recommendations for senior members of the armed forces and the judiciary, with broadly similar results. The review body has also recommended certain changes in the salary structure of the judiciary.

The new salary structures and levels recommended by the review body would increase the pay bill in a full year by 12·2 per cent. for senior civil servants, by 17·6 per cent. for senior members of the armed forces and by 16·3 per cent. for the judiciary.

The Government accept the view of the review body that it is of great importance for the health of the public service in this country that it should offer a career pay structure which will attract and retain people of the high quality which that service requires and deserves, and offers to the most able the prospect of being able eventually to attain levels of remuneration which, while not matching the highest levels of remuneration available in the private sector, provide rewards which can be regarded not only by themselves but also by Parliament and the public as fair but not generous in relation to the responsibilities carried.

We accept in principle the review body's recommendations on salary levels. But the amounts involved are so considerable that we feel bound to implement the salary increases recommended for these groups by stages, as has been done on other occasions in the past. Accordingly those concerned, with a very few exceptions, will receive half of the increases recommended, with a minimum of 5 per cent. with effect from 1 July 1985 and the balance with effect from 1 March 1986. It is proposed that London weighting for grade 3 and equivalent in the Civil Service should after appropriate consultation be built into pay. This would mean average increases for the financial year 1985-86 of 5·1 per cent. for senior civil servants, 7·3 per cent. for senior members of the armed forces and 7·1 for the judiciary. The cost of these increases in 1985-86 will be absorbed in existing public expenditure provisions and cash limits. I am circulating a note of the resulting rates of pay as an annex to this answer.

The review body recommends that the permanent secretaries of three Departments — the Ministry of Defence, the Home Office and the Department of Health and Social Security — should be paid at higher salary rates than other permanent secretaries in charge of Departments. The Government do not consider that there is a sufficiently strong case for departing from the long-established position that permanent secretaries in charge of Departments (other than the permanent secretary to the Tresury and the secretary of the Cabinet) are paid at the same rate, and have decided not to implement this recommendation. Accordingly the permanent secretaries of the three Departments concerned will continue to be paid at the same salary levels as other permanent secretaries in charge of Departments.

The review body propose that the system of discretionary increments for high performance recommended for senior civil servants in grades 2 and 3 should be introduced with effect from 1 April 1986. We shall give further consideration to this proposal, and to the arrangements for assessment, appraisal and review, on which such a system will depend, if it is realistically and fairly to reward high performance and to take account of cases in which high performance is not sustained, and I shall make a further statement on this aspect of the review body's recommendations in due course.

In accordance with the principle which was set out in my reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 13 April 1984, the superannuation entitlements of members of the groups in question will continue to be based on levels of salary actually in payment at or in the period before the date of retirement.

Also, the Armed Forces Pay Review Body has submitted to me a supplementary report on the pay of medical and dental officers in the armed forces. It recommends increases of between 4·9 per cent. and 8·4 per cent. according to rank with effect from 1 June 1985. This reflects the awards to civilian doctors and dentists that I announced in the House on 6 June 1985 at column 194-6.

The Government have decided to accept in full the recommendations in the supplementary report on the pay of medical and dental officers. The report has been published as Cmnd. 9568 and copies are available in the Vote Office.

2. Deputy and Under Secretaries will be credited with existing seniority.
3. It is proposed that London Weighting for Under Secretaries should be built into basic pay in two stages. 4. Rates for grades consequential on the salaries of senior grades of the higher Civil Service will be promulgated separately.
5. The salary of the Head of the Diplomatic Service will correspond to those of the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury and Secretary of the Cabinet as shown.
6. When both appointments are held by one person.
7. Members of the Lands Tribunal and the Registrar of Civil Appeals will retain their present salaries on a mark-time basis until exceeded by the recommended salaries increased by subsequent pay awards.

European Union

Q.55 Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her statement of 3 July, if she has yet decided on the representation which the United Kingdom will have at the European Economic Community special conference which is to discuss the draft treaty of European union.

The Prime Minister: Arrangements for the proposed intergovernmental conference, including the level of representation, will be discussed at the Foreign Affairs Council on 22 and 23 July.

Confederation of British Industry

Q63. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the recommendations about employment policy in the report "Financing the Future" by the Confederation of British Industry, a copy of which has been sent to her.

The Prime Minister: The CBI's report argues for a release of resources to the private sector as vital to the success of the economy. Within this, it calls for an increase in spending on infrastructure, especially roads, pointing to its beneficial impact on the economy generally, including employment. But the CBI stresses that this extra capital expenditure should be more than offset by reductions in public sector current spending. The Government's policies are similarly directed to containing public spending and borrowing as the best route to a growing economy and lasting jobs. Since we first took office in 1979, capital spending on national roads has increased by about a quarter in real terms.

Beirut Airport

Q.70 Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister what is the latest situation regarding the negotiations intended to co-ordinate international action over security at Beirut airport.

The Prime Minister: We are continuing our efforts to reach effective international agreement on measures relating to security at Beirut international airport. We hope that the international community will work together to ensure that the airport will not be used again as a safe haven for terrorists.

Engagements

Mr. Hunter asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 July.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 July.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

EEC Assembly (Powers)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will give an undertaking not to agree to any European Economic Community proposals which would in any way increase the powers of the European Economic Community Assembly.

The Prime Minister: To increase the powers of the European Assembly would require a change in the treaty which would have to be agreed by each national Parliament. I see no need for such a change. We shall continue to put forward suggestions of our own which would enable the assembly to play a more positive role within its existing powers.

Agriculture Industry

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on the proposals to reduce financial support for research, development and advisory services to the agriculture industry.

The Prime Minister: There is always room for improvement but there is already close and continuing collaboration between the two Departments on these matters.

Swavesey Fen Drainage

Dr. David Clark asked the Prime Minister what action Her Majesty's Government is now taking following the representations made to her by Cambridge Friends of the Earth with regard to the drainage scheme for Swavesey Fen.

The Prime Minister: I have received the representations from the Cambridge Friends of the Earth. I understand that the Swavesey internal drainage board started work on this scheme earlier this month. A meeting with statutory conservation bodies and the Anglian water authority was held in May to discuss the feasibility of amending the scheme which had been the subject of both a public inquiry in 1980 and of full discussions with the Nature Conservancy Council and the County Naturalist Trust throughout its design. A modification to the original scheme has now been approved by the Government that will allow the exclusion of Mare Fen and I understand that negotiations are now well advanced that should enable Mare Fen to be taken out of the scheme.

In these circumstances I doubt whether an article 4 direction is appropriate in this case.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

American Bar Association (Function)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Lord Privy Seal of he will estimate the total number of visitors coming to the Palace of Westminster as part of the American Bar Association function.

Mr. Biffen: Approximately 1,500 people were present in Westminster Hall for the American Bar Association function on Monday 15 July.

Official Opposition (Public Funds)

Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal (1) by how much the amounts disbursed from public funds to the official Opposition in the form of benefits in kind, such as office machinery, postal services, telecommunications and travel have been increased in each of the last five years;

(2) whether, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Woolwich on 15 July, he will specify what office machinery, postal services, telecommunications, travel and other benefits are included in the annual sums of £1,747 and £53,970 provided for the official Opposition from public funds.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug Trafficking

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the measures he is taking on enforcement action against drug trafficking.

Mr. Brittan: I have today announced a number of measures to strengthen police effort against drug trafficking and its co-ordination with customs. These measures accord with the key proposals submitted to me by the Association of Chief Police Officers earlier this month and I am acting immediately on them.

First, regional crime squads in England and Wales will be strengthened by the addition of dedicated drugs "wings". I am ready to consider any appropriate requests for the necessary adjustments in establishments and I have in mind an increase of more than 200 officers. The addition of dedicated drugs wings to RCSs will increase very substantially the capacity of the police to catch major drug trafficking groups. In London, the Commissioner has agreed to make a substantial increase in the strength of the Metropolitan police central drugs squad.

Secondly, there is to be a new national drugs intelligence unit, superseding the present central drugs intelligence unit. The new NDIU will be staffed by both the police and customs services and have an enhanced intelligence-gathering and analytical capability sharing common data in place of the present divided system. The new NDIU will provide both services with the intelligence capacity needed to counter today's sophisticated drug trafficking groups.

Thirdly, a new senior post of national drugs co-ordinator is being created in New Scotland Yard to head the new NDIU and co-ordinate drugs intelligence with the operations of regional crime squads. This will enable a greater concerted and co-ordinated attack to be mounted on drug traffickers. The first holder of this new post will be Mr. Colin Hewett, at present deputy assistant commissioner in charge of the Metropolitan police special branch and anti-terrorist squad.

Fourthly, I am establishing a top level steering group, on which both police and customs will be represented, to keep the working of the new arrangements and the effectiveness of liaison between police and customs under review and to give me periodic assessments of the nature and extent of the drugs threat.

I believe that the initiatives which I am announcing today represent a most significant advance in police operations against drug offences. They build on the proven work of the RCSs and the already close and effective co-operation between police and Her Majesty's customs and will ensure that both services are better placed than ever before to take forward the fight against drug traffickers.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from Central and South America were accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom for each year since 1970; and how many were refused leave to enter.

Mr. Waddington: Figures have been published annually from 1970 of persons refused leave to enter and from 1973 of persons accepted for settlement in respect of nationals of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Guyana, Mexico, Peru and Venezuela, and from 1978 of Uruguay, in "Control of Immigration Statistics" (tables 1 and 2 of the latest issue for the 1984 figures, Cmnd. 9544, and corresponding previous tables). Information is not available on nationals of other countries in Central and South America and Uruguay before 1978.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the proportion of wives admitted for settlement in the United Kingdom in 1984 who were admitted as wives of persons referred to in section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Waddington: It is estimated that about half the wives admitted for settlement from the Indian subcontinent in 1984 were wives of persons referred to in section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971. It is not possible to estimate a corresponding proportion for wives from other countries as information on applications for entry clearance is not collected for these countries.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will estimate the number of male persons born in the United Kingdom to whose wives and children section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971 does not apply;

(2) if he will estimate the number of men who fall within the definition of "Commonwealth citizens settled in the United Kingdom" in section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971; and how many of these men were born in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: This reply also contains information pursuant to my reply to the right hon. Member on 17 July.

It is estimated that there are about 2·1 million males now resident in the United Kingdom to whom section 1(5) applies as a result of their being Commonwealth citizens (including British citizens) who were settled in the United Kingdom on 1 January 1973. It is estimated that about ½ million of these were born outside the United Kingdom.

About 4½ million males have been born in the United Kingdom since 1 January 1973 and are therefore not within the scope of the provision.

The great majority of the wives and children of men born in this country will themselves be British citizens who are not subject to immigration control.

Deportations

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from Central and South America were deported in each year between 1970 and the present time; what were the reasons for these deportations; and to which countries they went.

Mr. Waddington: The available information, which is for 1973-84, is given in the following table. It is the normal practice to remove a person to the country of which he is a national, unless he can show that he is acceptable to another country. Information on the numbers removed to other countries is not readily available.

Small Businesses

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific measures he plans to undertake to implement the proposals, on matters within his responsibility, contained in the recent Department of Trade and Industry report on scrutiny of administrative and legislative requirements in small businesses.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government's response to the proposals in the report, including those relating to the Home Office, are set out in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" which was published on 16 July (Cmnd. 9571).

Police Women

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands police as to the number of police women as a percentage of the total force of the west midlands police constabulary, their levels of pay in comparison with those of their male counterparts and how many women have held the rank of detective inspector in the divisions of the West Midlands police constabulary during the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 June 1985 there were 860 women police officers in the West Midlands police, 13 per cent. of the force. One woman officer in the force has held the rank of detective inspector during the last five years. The salaries of women police officers are the same as those of their male counterparts.

London Schools (Police Involvement)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any formal discussions have taken place between the Metropolitan police and the Inner London education authority over the issue of police involvement in inner London schools.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Regular consultations take place between the Metropolitan police and all local education authorities, including the Inner London education authority on matters of mutual interest. These matters would clearly include the schools involvement programme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many schools in the inner London area have established formal consultative arrangements with the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that his statistics on schools which participate in the force's schools involvement programme do not distinguish between those in inner London and elsewhere, but that most schools in inner London receive liaison visits as part of the programme.

Police Stations (Lay Visitors)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there is any plan to extend the lay visitors to police stations initiative started in Lambeth and operated by members of the Lambeth community police consultative group.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend, as police authority for the Metropolitan police district, has appointed lay visitors to police stations in the London borough of Enfield and they are now receiving the necessary training; the scheme will begin on 1 September. He is at present considering nominations for appointment to panels in Hammersmith and Fulham, Harrow and Wandsworth and is awaiting nominations from Croydon and Hounslow. There have been discussions between officials on the establishment of panels in Bexley and Tower Hamlets and a meeting will shortly take place with Newham. Westminster city council has been invited to comment on a proposal to establish a scheme in that borough.

Metropolitan Police (Liaison)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will identify the range and type of community groups which he considers suitable to participate in liaison and consultation arrangements with the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The guidance on consultation between the community and the police in the Metropolitan police district which my right hon. and learned Friend issued last January under section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 states that membership of consultative groups should be open to "all bona fide formally constituted bodies which represent a significant number of local people".

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the London boroughs and district councils within the Metropolitan police district who currently co-operate in police liaison and consultation committees and who service such a structure in their area; when each structure was established; what is the composition of each committee; and how many elected members serve on the committees;

(2) if he will identify those London boroughs where consultation in the police liaison and consultation committees has been rejected by the local authority or where there are no plans to establish a consultation or liaison scheme.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police (Early Retirement)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables about how many of those police officers who have retired early due to ill health were on duties relating to the miners' strike; and what duties they performed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Parks (Dogs)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Wirral council has now resubmitted the draft byelaws to give park rangers greater control over dogs and dog owners using parks in its area; and when he expects to give his decision on them.

Mr. Mellor: On 14 May approval in principle was given to revised draft byelaws submitted by the council on 10 May. I understand that the council has adopted the byelaws and has just submitted them to the Home Office for confirmation. We are about to consult the council on an objection which we have today received and we hope very shortly to be in a position to decide whether the byelaws should be confirmed.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total amount of new disbursement by health authorities to nurses consequent upon 5 per cent. of the recent pay award now being paid at the end of August; what is his estimate of the interest at current rates which has been saved by health authorities as a result of payment not having been made on the due date of 1 April; and if he will take steps to disburse this sum in the form of a Christmas bonus in December additional to normal monthly salary payments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The total cost to health authorities in England in 1985-86 of the pay award to nurses and midwives is £173 million. The Government do not draw funds in advance of need. Although health authorities are notified of their annual allocations before the start of the financial year, they only draw cash on a daily basis. The question of interest does not therefore arise and there are no savings to health authorities as a result of the first stage of the award not being put into payment on 1 April. I am glad to say that most nurses are likely to receive their first stage awards backdated to 1 April in their August pay packets.

Snapethorpe Hospital, Wakefield

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of Snapethorpe hospital, Wakefield.

Mr. John Patten: Proposals about the future of Snapethorpe hospital are the responsibility of Wakefield health authority. The right hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the information available to his Department from sample surveys of the charges being made for ordinary board and lodging accomodation at the time when the weekly upper limits for ordinary board and lodging claims provided under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Regulations 1985 were set.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Islington South and Finsbury on 20 June at column 197 and on 17 July.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how much was being paid in board and lodging allowances in each year since 1979 in respect of people living in residential homes and registered nursing homes, respectively; and what is his estimate for 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) how many people receiving board and lodging allowance were living in residential homes and registered nursing homes, respectively, in each year since1979; and what is his Departmemnt's estimate of the likely total at the end of 1985-86 and in 1986-87.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The following table gives numbers of residents in private and voluntary homes receiving supplementary benefit and total amounts of benefit paid for each year from 1979 to 1984. Reliable forecasts for subsequent years are not available.

	Number of residents	Total Annual Expenditure (based on December Figures) £ million
1979	11,000	10
1980	12,000	18
1981	12,000	23
1982	15,700	39
*1983	25,800	102
†1984	42,500	190

* provisional.
† estimate.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment has been made by his Department of the likely impact of the change in board and lodging allowance of the standard of provision for residential care in the private and voluntary sectors, respectively.

Mr. Newton: The new limits are intended to allow reasonable charges to be met in homes satisfying the registration requirements. We have undertaken to keep the limits under review. We shall take careful account of representations and of monitoring and inquiries we have initiated.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the likely impact of the change in board and lodging allowance on the quality and extent of the policy of care in the community.

Mr. Newton: Existing arrangements for people with special needs living in the community in ordinary board and lodging accommodation under adult fostering schemes and similar arrangdments will be unaffected, save by changes in the level of the local limits. They will remain eligible for the £16·15 extension to the local limits, and where attendance allowance is in payment it will be disregarded in the normal way. It will, as now, be possible for local authorities to top up these payments if additional help is needed.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for social Services what consultation took place with chief medical and nursing officers in his Department on the likely impact of the change in board and lodging allowances on the programme to increase and improve care in the community.

Mr. Newton: It is not the practice to disclose details of internal discussions among officials within Government Departments.

Epilepsy

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has for the establishment of special assessment centres and clinics as recommended in the 1984 report of the working group on services for people with epilepsy.

Mr. John Patten: The report of the working group on services for people with epilepsy was made to the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of Education and Science and the Welsh Office. Following consultation with the standing medical advisory committee and the standing nursing and midwifery advisory committee, it is hoped to issue the report shortly to health authorities and local authority social services departments. It is not the intention that the report should be treated as a blueprint for the provision of services by all authorities. The scope for adoption of particular recommendations in different areas will depend on the pattern of existing services, availability of resources and local priorities.

NHS (Private Medicine)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department monitors contractual arrangements between the National Health Service and the private medical sector.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We know from the annual accounts of health authorities the expenditure on contractual arrangements for patient care. and we know from statistical returns the number of patients receiving treatment under contractual arrangements. We encourage health authorities to make increased use of private sector facilities for the treatment of National Health Service patients wherever this is a cost-effective way of improving or extending the service they can provide.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give an indication of the effect on (a) the capital spending approvals and (b) the revenue allocations for a district health authority if private care and treatment is purchased by an authority for National Health Service patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Neither is affected.

Drugs

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in the light of the 15th report of the doctors and dentists review body. whether he will initiate an inquiry into the costs, other than those of drugs, incurred by doctors in dispensing National Health Service drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no proposals for such an inquiry.

Housing Benefits

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to give effect to the recommendation on the extension of local authorities' discretionary powers to provide extra help to individual beneficiaries, contained in paragraph 4.20 of the report of the housing benefit review team, Cmnd. 9520.

Mr. Newton: This is something we shall consider further in the light of any views received as part of the consultation process.

Spectacles (Unlawful Sale)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many prosecutions have been mounted by the general optical council for the unlawful sale of glasses without a prescription since the optical provisions of the Health and Social Services Act 1984 came into operation;

(2) how many prosecutions have been mounted in each year since 1979 by (a) the general optical council and (b) trading standards officers for the unlawful sale of spectacles to persons aged under 16 years by suppliers other than a registered ophthalmic and dispensing optician;

(3) how many prosecutions for the unlawful sale of glasses without a prescription have been mounted by trading standards officers since the optical provisions of the Health and Social Services Act 1984 came into operation;

(4) how many prosecutions are under consideration by the the general optical council for the unlawful sale of glasses without a prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am informed by the general optical council that it is unable to identify any prosecutions mounted since 1979 for the unlawful sale of spectacles to persons under the age of 16 years. Since the optical provisions of the Health and Social Security Act 1984 came into operation the general optical council has not instituted any prosecutions for supplying glasses without prescription. However, it has one possible case concerning the unlawful sale of glasses without prescription under consideration. I am informed by the Office of Fair Trading that it is unable to identify details of any such prosecutions mounted by trading standards officers.

Nurses (Manpower Levels)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list nursing manpower levels in National Health Service hospitals in each year since 1979; and which district or regional health authorities have been affected most resulting from decreases in such manpower.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have such comparable information as can be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

Services for Children

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many regional reviews during the last six years have involved services for children; whether there will be any reviews in the near future concerning the implementation of circular HM(71)22; and whether his Department will examine the regional strategic plans with the needs of children in hospital in mind.

Mr. John Patten: Regional reviews are not intended to carry out monitoring of particular questions in every region but are used for follow up major strategic issues selectively with individual regions, and the consequent action plans which should reflect local priorities. It is not possible to say to what extent implementation of HM(71)22 will feature in future reviews — this will depend on the nature of the major issues in particular regions. Officials in the Department examine all regional strategic plans to ensure that proposed developments in services for children in hospital are consistent with Departmental policy.

Maternity Services

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what conclusions he has reached following his monitoring of action taken by regional health authorities on the three reports of the maternity services advisory committee.

Mr. John Patten: We are currently examining regional strategic plans but we are not yet ready to draw conclusions.

Spectacles (Prices)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies his Department has made and is making of the movement in the price of glasses before and after the implementation of the optical provisions of the Health and Social Services Act 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I see no worthwhile purpose in carrying out detailed studies in an attempt to arrive at statistically sound before-and-after comparisons in such a diverse field as spectacles. Such studies could be very expensive and time consuming. We are collecting general information on opticians' prices and the selections of new budget frames that are coming on the market. We are satisfied that a wider range of lower priced spectacles has become available as a result of the implementation of the Act.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing in terms of 1985 prices expenditure under the social security budget under the principal heads in 1973, 1979 and 1984 compared with the estimate for the current year; and if he will provide similar figures for employee's and employer's contributions.

Mr. Whitney: Social security benefit expenditure and national insurance fund contribution receipts are set out for financial years 1973-74, 1979-80, 1984-85 and 1985-86 in the tables.

† Invalid care allowance was introduced in July 1976.

‖ Mobility allowance was introduced in January 1976.

¶ The 1973-74 figure is for family allowance. Later years include child benefit and one parent benefit. All years include guardian's allowance and child's special allowance.

• The supplementary benefit figures for 1973-74 and 1979-80 include assistance with housing costs which is covered by housing benefit in 1984-85 and 1985-86.

■ Includes rent rebates, rent allowances and rate rebates. Comparable figures for 1973-74 are not available.

Benefit Payments

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons are currently in receipt of one or more of the following benefits: supplementary benefit, housing benefit and family income supplement.

Mr. Whitney: The information, for the latest dates available, is as follows:

	Number (thousands)	Date
Supplementary benefit	4,600	*August 1984
Housing benefit	about 7,500	†current estimate
Family income supplement	199	‡April 1985

More than one of the benefits may be paid to the same person at the same time. Householders receiving supplementary benefit generally also receive housing benefit.

Sick Pay

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how he proposes to follow up the options for changes in statutory sick pay identified in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" Cmnd. 9571, published on 16 July.

Mr. Whitney: Before considering whether the options on statutory sick pay contained in the White Paper should be pursued, the Government are seeking the views of interested parties. I have accordingly issued a consultation paper today to organisations representing both employers and employees interests. The purpose of the consultation paper is not at this stage to put forward Government proposals but to provide an appropriate opportunity for comment from those who would be affected if such changes were to be made. Decisions will then be taken in the light of the comments received.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many men and how many women earned extra retirement pension by deferring retirement to 70 and 65 years respectively during 1983-84 and 1984-85; and what was the average size of the increased weekly basic pension.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 66]: Information for 1984-85 is not yet available. Information for 1983-84 is as follows:

	Number	Average rate of increased basic pension £
Men who deferred retirement to age 70	7,660	45·76
Women who deferred retirement to age 65	2,270	44·71
Married women aged 65 whose husbands deferred their retirement to age 70	2,380	24·77

These rates are at November 1983 benefit levels (basic retirement pension in November 1983 was £34·05, £20·45 for a married woman on her husband's insurance).

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 1 July, Official Report, column 45-6 how many households recorded in the annual statistical inquiry for December 1983 were having deductions made from their supplementary benefit for electricity and how many for gas in £1 bands above £12 per week.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985, c 534-5]: The table sets out the information requested on deductions for electricity, as recorded in the annual statistical inquiry for December 1983. Because of the sample size, a reliable breakdown cannot be made in bands over £18 a week.

Electricity direct arrangements—December 1983

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

CSCE (Cultural Forum)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's attitude towards the conference on security and co-operation in Europe cultural forum which will take place in Budapest from 15 October to 25 November.

Mr. Renton: We intend to play a full and positive role in this important part of the whole CSCE process. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas) has kindly accepted my invitation to lead our delegation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Postgraduate Certificate in Education

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applicants there were for the postgraduate certificate in education course for 1985-86 in (a) mathematics and (b) physics; and how the applications for this coming year compare with those for the years 1984-85 and 1983-84.

Mr. Dunn: As at 10 July the numbers of applications received by the graduate teacher training registry for entry in September 1985 to postgraduate certificate in education courses in mathematics and physics were 1,119 and 474 respectively. The corresponding figures for September 1984 entry were 1,420 and 657; and for September 1983 entry 1,634 and 747.

School Standards (Report)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the conclusions of the second report of the National Council for Educational Standards on standards in English schools, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the latest survey by the National Council for Educational Standards, a copy of which has been sent to him, in so far as it affects Government policy towards comprehensive schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I welcome the report of this further study examining various factors affecting examination performance in schools and confirming the strong statistical association between that performance and social background. The study highlights wide differences in examination results both between types of school—selective and non-selective—and different schools of the same kind. The suggested focus for future research is not inconsistent with the decision I announced last November about the nature of research which the Department might be willing to fund if suitable proposals were submitted.

As the authors state, the findings are capable of a variety of interpretations, the issues are very complex and the inferences drawn tentative. It will take a little time to study in detail the report and its findings.

Drug Abuse

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what basis he calculated the sum of £2 million as being suitable to provide to education authorities for appointing drug abuse co-ordinators for schools; which specific education authorities are to benefit from this allocation; and what particular projects he is funding to prepare curriculum material for secondary school teachers and to analyse how education authorities are tackling drug misuse.

Mr. Dunn: The sum is based on average expenditure of £20,000 by every local education authority. This should be sufficient to appoint, or second, from April 1986 a member of staff to stimulate and co-ordinate action in the education service aimed at the prevention of drugs misuse (or to provide an equivalent level of activity in other ways). In addition to the salary costs of the staff involved, the level of grant is intended to cover appropriate overheads and operating expenses including arrangements for training teachers and other professional staff. All authorities are being invited to submit bids and are eligible to benefit from the support grants.

The Department is providing some £85,000 for the Health Education Council for the preparation and testing of a comprehensive range of suitable curriculum materials for teachers and teacher trainers; £10,000 for the Wirral education authority to assess the effects of curriculum materials in use locally and designed to counter drug misuse; and £11,000 for the National Foundation for Educational Research to prepare an account using the educational management information exchange network of how individual education authorities are tackling drugs misuse.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what training will be given to the drug abuse co-ordinators; and how they will be assisted.

Mr. Dunn: This will be for each local authority to determine in the light of the individual staff appointed and the range of activity to be undertaken.

Teachers (Resignations)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how many teachers on pay scale I and II under the age of 40 years have resigned from the profession in the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The wastage rates of teachers on specific pay scales by age are not readily available but total wastage of all teachers under the age of 40 in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales was:

	Number
1979-80	23,723
1980-81	21,573
1981-82	17,825
1982-83	16,572

Higher Education

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make additional resources available to enable university and polytechnic lecturers who according to their current levels of pay are in the upper limit of the lowest teaching grade to gain access to greater promotion prospects.

Sir Keith Joseph: No. In the polytechnics, fewer than 1 per cent. of all lecturers are paid on the lowest scale, and almost all teachers have automatic career progression to senior lecturer at maximum annual salary of over £14,000. In the universities the maximum of the lecturer scale is £14,925.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the extent to which levels of pay have risen year by year from each academic year since 1978-79 for lecturers, senior lecturers and heads of department at universities, polytechnics and colleges of further or higher education.

Sir Keith Joseph: Pay increases varied only minimally between the various grades and were as follows:

Academic year (1 October to 30 September)	Percentage increases
	Lecturers, senior lecturers and heads of department in maintained establishments of further and higher education	Assistant lecturers/lecturers/senior lecturers/readers in universities
1978-79	9·3	15·6
1979-80	*34·4-37·9	‖25·3
1980-81	7·5	‖¶19·2
1981-82	†5·0	5·0
1982-83	5·0	•4·6
1983-84	‡4·6	■4·6

* Compounded of a 2-stage arbitral award and a 2-stage "comparability award" (Clegg). The resulting increases varied within the range indicated according both to scale and scale point.

† Plus £69 at each scale point, plus a further £108 at the maximum of the Lecturer 1 scale. (Settlement worth 5·8 per cent. overall).

‡ Plus £330 at the maximum of the Lecturer 1 scale. (Settlement worth 5·1 per cent. overall).

‖ Includes 17 per cent. phased comparability award.

¶ Plus £100 on the maximum of the Lecturer and corresponding points on other scales. (Settlement worth 19·4 per cent. overall).

• Plus increase arising from adjustments to the Lecturer scale. (Settlement worth 4·7 per cent. overall).

■ Plus £150 on maximum of the Lecturer and corresponding points on other scales. (Settlement worth 4·8 per cent. overall).

Schools (Political Indoctrination)

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to amend the Education Act 1944 so as to prohibit political indoctrination in schools.

Mr. Dunn: We have made it clear that what is provided in schools should always be education and never indoctrination; we have no plans to introduce legislation on this matter.

Pre-school Playgroups

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number and proportion of children entering school who have previously attended a pre-school playgroup.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his oral reply, 21 May 1985, c. 853]: The figure of 33 per cent. quoted is an estimate of the places available at all playgroups in England, as a proportion of the total three and four-year-old population. Most children attend playgroups for fewer than the total number of sessions per week that are available. About 70 per cent. of playgroups are members of the Pre-school Playgroup Association, which estimates that, in 1984, 42 per cent. of all three and four-year-olds attended PPA playgroups.

ENVIRONMENT

Wild Birds

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department received from the European Commission the report entitled, "Apercu des zones de grant interet pour la conservation des oiseaux sauvages"; and if he will (a) place a copy in the Library and (b) list in the Official Report those sites contained in the report which relate to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My Department has not received this report, but the Nature Conservancy Council received a copy in November 1984. The report is a European Commission working document and is not intended for publication. The hon. Member may however find it helpful to know that the Nature Conservancy Council has identified the following sites which in its opinion meet the criteria for listing under the EC birds directive and/or designation under the Ramsar convention:

Acute Services (NHS)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the averge cash value of total National Health Service acute services received by a person living in each of the Scottish regional health authorities and in each district authority, respectively.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for health and social work gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 17 December 1984, at columns 55-56.

Land Court

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the present composition of the Scottish land court together with the dates on which each of the present members retires and any conditions such as a knowledge of Gaelic or a crofting background which will be applied to the filling of any vacancy.

Mr. Younger: The Scottish land court consists of a chairman (the hon. Lord Elliott MC) and three members (Mr. A. B. Campbell OBE, Mr. A. Gillespie MBE and Mr. D. D. McDiarmid JP). The chairman has to be an advocate of 10 years' standing and has the same rank and tenure of office as if he had been appointed a judge of the Court of Session. He is required to retire on reaching age 75, and Lord Elliott will be 75 in September 1997. The members retire at age 65, respectively, in October 1986, June 1992 and November 1996. Members are required to have extensive experience of crofting and agriculture and preferably have some qualification in agriculture or related discipline and one must be a Gaelic speaker. Some knowledge of crofting and agricultural law as well as experience in valuation and arbitration are also regarded as desirable qualifications for any prospective members.

Improvement Grants

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to publish his proposals on improvement grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I had hoped that it would be possible to publish the results of our review of private sector improvement policy, in the form of a Green Paper, before the summer recess. There are, however, a number of areas where the distinctive nature of the housing stock has required consideration which has taken rather longer than expected. I shall publish our proposals as soon as possible.

Gannets

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what applications he has received for a licence to take gannets or to sell gannets from the island of Sula Sgeir: and if he is prepared to approve this application.

Mr. Ancram: An application to take gannets from the island of Sula Sgeir has been received in the course of the last few days. Having considered all the relevant factors, including the advice of the Nature Conservancy Council, my right hon. Friend proposes to issue a licence to take 2,000 gannets on the same conditions as in previous years.

Health Initiatives

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether it is the policy of the Government to implement conclusion 43(1) of the 17th report from the Committee of Public Accounts on the National Health Service, general dental service, which stated that the Scottish Home and Health Department should consider whether further special initiatives are required in Scotland;

(2) whether he will make it his policy to consider conclusion 43(1) of the 17th report from the Committee of Public Accounts on the National Health Service, general dental service, before any decision is made on the future of the Edinburgh dental hospital and school.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government's response to the report is under consideration and will be given by Treasury minute in due course. The views expressed by the Committee will be borne in mind in any discussions about the Edinburgh dental hospital and school.

Hunterston A Power Station

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide information on the thermal output and fuel discharged from Hunterston A power station in the calendar years 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information sought is not readily available for calendar years.

The information for 1983-84 was given in my reply to the hon. Member on 22 February 1985, at column 617. The information for 1984-85 is as follows:

	1984-85
Thermal output (GWh)	8,922
Fuel Discharged (tonnes u)	80·6

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid and Trade

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the rules laid down by both the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development against which projects applying for aid and trade provision support are measured.

Mr. Rifkind: To conform with the requirements of the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the export credit arrangement, a tied aid credit, whether a mixed credit (a combination of aid and export credit) or a single integrated aid loan, must have a grant element of at least 25 per cent.

Additionally, under the guiding principles agreed between OECD members for the use of official development assistance in association with export credits and other market funds, the members of the development assistance committee of the OECD undertake to confine such transactions to priority projects and programmes which are carefully appraised against the developmental standards and criteria applicable to official development assistance programmes and which form part of the recipient country's development programme. These agreed guiding principles are set out in full on page 43 of the ODA's annual review "British Overseas Aid 1983", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

"Famine in Africa"

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in respect of his observations on the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, Session 1984-85, on "Famine in Africa," Cmnd. 9566, paragraph (xxxii), what are the relevant sums in respect of each of the following categories: allocations already agreed for food aid, disaster relief and for emergency actions under the European development fund, relief aid to famine-affected countries in the last 12 months derived from these funds, other sums devoted to these purposes together with the name of the funds from which they have been drawn and the sums allocated from all programmes, including the above, made available due to unavoidable slippage in expenditure, together with the respective reasons for such slippage for each sum and fund concerned.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is as follows. The figures remain provisional pending finalisation of the Appropriation Account.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) in respect of his observations on the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, Session 1984-85, "Famine in Africa", Cmnd. 9566, paragraph (xxxiv), if he will give a breakdown of the 1,200,000 tonnes of cereals committed at the Dublin Council derived physically from: intervention stocks within the European Economic Community and cereals purchased from the world market, together with the overall cost and cost per tonne cif at port of delivery for each category in European currency units and pound sterling at a given exchange rate;

(2) in respect of his observations on the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, Session 1984-85, on "Famine in Africa", Cmnd. 9566, paragraph (xxxiv), if he will set out a comparative table in respect of an approximate or actual breakdown of cost per tonne in respect of cereals allocated at the Dublin Council drawn from intervention stocks and world markets, respectively, for each of the following, or similar, categories of expenditure: purchase cost, export subsidy or state assistance where applicable, shipping cost, insurance and agency costs.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is not available in the form requested, either in respect of the Community's commitments under the Dublin plan, or in respect of member states' commitments. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will send the hon. Member what information he can on these points as soon as possible.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, in respect of his observations on the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, Session 1984-85, on "Famine in Africa", Cmnd. 9566, paragraph (xxxiv), what specific representations were made by Her Majesty's Government to the appropriate authorities of the European Economic Community to activate existing emergency procedures to speed up delivery of aid under the normal food aid programme; what reply he has received; and if he will make a statement concerning the further intentions of Her Majesty's Government on this matter.

Mr. Rifkind: Her Majesty's Government urged that emergency procedures should be used for food aid for famine affected countries at meetings in Brussels on 30 January, 15 February, 5 March and 14 May. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development emphasised the need to speed up food aid deliveries in discussion with Commissioner Natali on 4 March, and raised the question of emergency procedures at the Development Council on 23 May. Ministers and officials have also discussed it in informal contacts with the Commission, which are now reviewing the procedures for allocating emergency aid. We intend to press for rapid conclusions from this review.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what projects have been undertaken, or what direct assistance has been rendered, by the Tropical Development and Research Institute or its predecessors in respect of areas now subject to famine in Africa in the course of the last five years; and in respect of each project or programme, what was the name of the commissioning body and the source of the funds for the payment of the work, together with particulars of any requests or proposals received from any quarter which have been declined over the same period, together with the dates concerned and reasons for the refusal of any request.

Mr. Rifkind: A list of current activities by the Tropical Development and Research Institute in East and West Africa is set out in the table. For the past five years the proportion of effort devoted to Africa has increased from 19 to 25 per cent., reflecting increased regional technical co-operation demand. All such technical co-operation requests have been met. Twenty-four contract opportunities were declined over the five-year period because suitable staff were unavailable. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will write to the hon. Member with details of projects carried out earlier in the five-year period when the information has been compiled.

Note:

This list does not include United Kingdom based research and development projects on semi-arid and arid land crops which have a wider geographical application or training programmes (individual or group) for Central African trainees which are undertaken in the United Kingdom. Similarly, it does not include short projects, perhaps of an innovative nature, which might be undertaken at the TDRI as a result of requests for technical information of short "fire-brigading" visits of up to one month arising from specific requests for technical assistance.

The total level of TDRI effort in the form of contracts, long and short-term technical co-operation and allied R and D programmes in the Sub-Sahel Africa is likely to reach 47 man years in 1985-86, representing 16 per cent. of the institute's total effort.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, in respect of his observations on the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, Session 1984-85, on "Famine in Africa," Cmnd. 9566, paragraph (xxviii), what are the specific contracts, projects or programmes now being undertaken by the Tropical Development and Research Institute, listing for each respective piece of work now in hand, the name of the commissioning body, the approximate cost in pound sterling, the expected date for the completion of each item, and the main locations of the work being undertaken.

Mr. Rifkind: Paragraph 28 of the observations drew attention in particular to European Community research contracts obtained by the Tropical Development and Research Institute. Details of these are given in the table. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will write to the hon. Member when the details of the full current work programme have been compiled.

Tropical Development and Research Institute

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in tabular form the number of personnel currently employed by the Tropical Development and Research Institute in each of its constituent parts for categories of personnel as set out in the memorandum submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee in a previous Session, together with the respective numbers of personnel employed by its predecessor bodies in 1980.

Mr. Rifkind: The table is as follows:

	Staff in post
1 April 1980
Tropical Products Institute and Centre for Overseas Pest Research combined	436
1 June 1985
Tropical Development and Research Institute	371

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in respect of the Tropical Development and Research Institute, he will tabulate for each of the scientific disciplines the numbers of personnel employed who possess graduate or broadly equivalent professional qualifications, together with the number of vacancies in each discipline for which funded posts exist and the number of additional posts which will need to be filled for any future approved scheme of expansion.

Mr. Rifkind: The information is as follows:

Discipline	Posts filled (graduates or equivalent)	Graduate-level Posts Vacant and under recruitment
Biology/Chemistry	70	10
Engineering	20	1
Economics	15	—
Others	92	10
Total	197	21

There are no plans for expansion.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Local Government (Cash Limits)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give revised cash limits for 1985-86 resulting from the carry forward of capital underspends allowed under the end-year flexibility schemes for central Government and for local authority expenditure.

Mr. Peter Rees: A list of revised cash limits is shown in the following table. The changes for voted expenditure are subject to parliamentary approval of Supplementary Estimates. The total increase in cash limits in respect of end-year flexibility is £221 million (the corresponding figure last year was £282 million). This increase will be met from the reserve and will therefore not add to the public expenditure planning total.

Revisions to 1985-86 cash limits resulting from the carry forward of capital underspend in 1984-85

Stationery Office Appointments

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what agreements with trade unions preclude staff employed by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in provincial regions from applying for posts in London; which unions are involved; and what is the nature of such agreements.

Mr. Hayhoe: The following agreements are relevant:
i. One with the bookselling grades committee (SOGAT) under which supervisory posts at the HMSO Publications Centre are normally filled by staff there;
ii. another with the same body under which supervisory posts at the bookshop in Holborn are open only to staff employed there;
iii. one with SOGAT's London central branch under which industrial vacancies at the London bookshop are open only to industrials at the Publications Centre.
Conversely, supervisory vacancies in any one of the HMSO bookshops outside London are open only to staff employed in that bookshop or in one of the other provincial bookshops.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether opportunities for promotion throughout Her Majesty's Stationery Office nationwide are open to members of staff presently employed outside London.

Mr. Hayhoe: There are no geographical restrictions on eligibility for promotion within Her Majesty's Stationery Office except that:
i. Only people in the locality are normally considered for vacancies in non-mobile grades, although there is usually provision for staff in other localities to apply for consideration;
ii. by agreement with bookselling grades committee (SOGAT) only staff in London are considered for appropriate supervisory vacancies there.
Geographical restrictions may also be agreed as occasion arises with the union concerned in order to deal with particular circumstances e.g. a local staff surplus.

Pension Funds (Taxation)

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he now plans to bring forward a Green Paper on the future taxation of pension funds.

Mr. Moore: No.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish the Government's Green Paper on personal taxation.

Mr. Moore: Later this year.

Small Businesses

Mr. John Browne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what specific measures he plans to undertake to implement the proposals, on matters within his responsibility, contained in the recent report on the scrutiny of administrative and legislative requirements in small businesses.

Mr. Moore: The White Paper published on 16 July entitled "Lifting the Burden" set out the action being taken by the Government following the recent scrutiny report on administrative and legislative requirements on small businesses. The White Paper has been widely welcomed.

Departmental Promotion Campaigns

Mr. Squire asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the Central Office of Information guidelines for promotional campaigns by Government Departments.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Central Office of Information works within the conventions applied by successive Governments to their publicity and advertising. A note on these conventions has been sent to the Widdicombe committee and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Trustee Savings Bank

Mr. Gordon Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reply his Department sent to the letter dated 17 April 1982 from the Trustee Savings Bank central board which referred to the question of ownership of the Trustee Savings Bank and, in particular, to the legal opinion obtained by the board from John Murray, QC; and if he will publish the reply in the Official Report.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Neither the Treasury nor the central board has any record of a letter meeting the description which the hon. Member gives. However, I would not in any case be prepared to publish documents relating to confidential discussions between the Treasury and other bodies.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the estimate in the public expenditure White Paper that the United Kingdom would be required to make a net contribution to the European Economic Community of £960 million in 1987 is still valid in the light of the decisions on spending made by the European Economic Community since the time of publication of the White Paper.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The figure in the public expenditure White Paper to which my hon. Friend refers relates to the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget for the financial year 1987-88, inclusive of non-allocated expenditure, and is £970 million rather than £960 million. An updated projection of our net payments to the Community, taking account of recent developments, will be published in the autumn statement. Further information will be contained in the next White Paper.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether (1) he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United States of America and the United Kingdom the change in the incidence of (a) direct and (b) indirect taxation since 1979 for a person on average earnings so far as this can be calculated;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the years 1973-74, 1978-79 and the current financial year, at a full year rate, the percentage of gross income taken in (a) direct taxes, including national insurance contributions less child benefit and (b) indirect taxation, in the case of a married man with two children, one earner and no other allowances where the earnings of the married man are (i) 45 per cent., (ii) 60 per cent., (iii) 100 per cent., (iv) 200 per cent. and (v) 300 per cent. of average earnings; and if he will provide comparable figures for single persons;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the yield from the abolition of age allowances for (a) married couples and (b) single persons; and if he will include in each case the cost of abolishing the income limit by abolishing the claw-back;

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated taxable values in the current financial year of benefits to taxation under special taxation rules under the different headings together with the real values in each case;

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for (a) single persons, (b) married persons with one earner and (c) married persons with two earners each aged (i) under 65 years and (ii) 65 years and over, the estimated number of incomes in each income range starting at a lower limit of £2,000, and the total tax, as a proportion of total income, excluding family income supplement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will bring up to date the figures in his written reply dated 27 March 1984, Official Report, columns 105-6, concerning the mortgage advances and the price of dwellings together with the estimated average cost of mortgage interest tax relief per mortgagee in the current financial year and the assumed average rate of interest;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of income and for (a) single persons, (b) married couples without wives' earned income and (c) other married couples, the estimated annual value of claims for mortgage relief and the cost to the Exchequer, assuming the present level of interest rates prevails throughout the year;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of taxpayers in each taxation group receiving relief on mortgage interest and the average relief per mortgagor, together with the assumed rate of interest in the same manner as of his answer of 7 March 1983, Official Report, column 284;

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table on the same lines as given in his answer of 6 March 1984, Official Report, column 501, of the estimated percentage of each income band benefitting from mortgage interest relief (a) with investment income and (b) without.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Capital Gains

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the estimated annual yield of the treatment under income tax of all realised capital gains as investment income;

(2) what is the estimated yield of the treatment under income tax of all capital gains as they accrue as investment income;

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his replies, 15 July 1985, c. 42]: I regret that the information on which to base estimates is not available.

Value Added Tax (EC Budget)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the percentage level of value added tax take-up for the United Kingdom for each EEC budget since 1975.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985, c. 84]: Value added tax was included in the revenue of the budgets of the European Community for the first time in 1979. Prior to that date member states made financial contributions to the Community. From 1975, and until a uniform VAT rate could be applied in 1979 these contributions were calculated on the basis of the gross national product (GNP) share of member states.

The United Kingdom received refunds from the Community to offset its contribution to the budgets for the years 1980 to 1983. To offset our contribution to the 1984 budget the United Kingdom's VAT contributions to the 1985 budget are to be abated by 1,000 mecu, leading to an effective VAT rate considerably less than 1 per cent.

The gross VAT rates (ie prior to refund or abatement) at which the United Kingdom contributed for the years 1979 to the latest adopted budget for 1985 are as follows:

VAT percentage rate (prior to refund/abatement)

	Percentage
1979	0·789
1980	0·732
1981	0·787
1982	0·925
1983	0·998
1984	1·000
1985	1·000

Notes:

(i) Source: Adopted General Budgets, or final Supplementary and amending budget for the year in question.

(ii) Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland and Luxembourg paid GDP based financial contributions in 1979.

(iii) With the exception of Greece, which joined in 1981 and until 1984 paid a GNP based contribution all member states have paid VAT contributions from 1980.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Emergency Alarms

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what grants are available from his Department for the buying, installation and running of emergency alarms for the elderly and disabled; and what information he has as to grants available from local authorities for similar purposes.

Mr. Chris Patten: Housing Association grant is available to registered housing associations for the purchase and installation of emergency alarm systems in sheltered housing schemes and for the linking of these to a centralised warden call system. The running costs of this service are borne by the tenants through a charge included in their rent.

In addition under the house renovation grant scheme administered by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, the cost of provision and installation of emergency alarms in the homes of disabled people may be grant-aided. However, this assistance cannot be extended to include maintenance or running costs.

Under Section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1978 health and social services boards may also make arrangements for the provision of facilities such as telephones or alarms in the homes of disabled persons at risk.

RUC (Complaints and Discipline Branch)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list, by rank, the number of police officers presently working in the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline branch.

Mr. Scott: There are at present 61 police officers attached to the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline department:

1 Assistant Chief Constable
2 Chief Superintendents
11 Superintendents
20 Chief Inspectors
10 Inspectors
10 Sergeants
7 Constables

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of civilians, with equivalent Civil Service grades, presently working with the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline branch.

Mr. Scott: There are at present 35 civilians attached to the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline department:

1 Executive Officer Grade I
6 Clerks
9 Clerical Assistants
19 Typists and Ancillary Staff

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list, by rank, the number of police officers who will be required in the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline branch if the recommendations in the consultative paper on police complaints and discipline are accepted;

(2) if he will list the number of civilians, with equivalent Civil Service grades, who will be required in the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline branch if the recommendations in the consultative paper on police complaints and discipline are accepted;

(3) what estimate has been provided to him as to the likely total cost of implementing the recommendations contained in the consultative paper on police complaints and discipline during the first year of operation.

Mr. Scott: The future civilian staffing and police manpower requirements of the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline department are matters for the Chief Constable and the police authority to determine. It would be premature for an assessment to be made of the cost of any reforms in advance of substantive legislative proposals, but I do not expect that there would be substantial resource implications for the RUC in the implementation of the proposals in the consultative paper.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the total police hours worked in the complaints and discipline branch of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for each year since 1980;

(2) if he will list the total police hours worked by officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, other than members of the complaints and discipline branch but working at the direction of that branch, for each year since 1980;

(3) if he will list the total cost of employing officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, other than members of the complaints and discipline branch, for work involved in investigating complaints for each year since 1980;

(4) if he will list the total cost of investigating complaints against the Royal Ulster Constabulary subsequently found to be malicious, frivolous or otherwise unjustified for each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total cost of employing those police officers employed in the complaints and discipline branch of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the estimated cost of the police officers employed in the Royal Ulster constabulary Complaints and discipline department for 1985-86 is £1·7 million.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total cost of employing those civilians employed in the complaints and discipline branch of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the estimated cost of the civilians employed in the RUC complaints and discipline department for 1985-86 is £250,000.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total of all costs, by category, involved in running the Royal Ulster Constabulary complaints and discipline branch for each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: This information is not available in the form requested, as the police authority for Northern Ireland does not record police expenditure on a departmental basis.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what number of complaints against the Royal Ulster Constabulary made in each year since 1980 were subsequently found to be (a) malicious, (b) frivolous, and (c) unjustified for other reasons.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the Royal Ulster Constabulary maintains records of complaints which cannot be investigated for various reasons. Figures for the years in question are as follows:

	Number
1980	86
1981	192
1982	205
1983	462
1984	552

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total number of people who have been charged with wasting police time in relation to complaints against the Royal Ulster Constabulary which were subsequently found to be malicious, frivolous or otherwise unjustified for each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: There has been none.

Nuclear Shelters

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what considerations governed the choice of the sites for the three proposed new nuclear shelters.

Mr. Scott: The three purpose-designed civil defence control centres are planned to accommodate six civil defence teams. Five teams would be responsible for regional government in the province and the administration of four areas conterminous with those of the health and social services boards, and one would constitute a small reserve. It is proposed to house two teams in each building.

In selecting the sites, consideration was given to centricity to the areas covered (the Belfast area being avoided as it already contains the normal peacetime administration of the Province) and to the availability of Government-owned land.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the role and purpose of the three proposed new nuclear shelters in the event of a nuclear attack affecting Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The purpose of the three proposed buildings is to provide protected accommodation from which to carry on government at provincial and area levels, and to permit the administration of vital functions for the welfare of the community, after a nuclear attack.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining what officials or representatives will use the three nuclear shelters; and how they have been, or will be, selected.

Mr. Scott: The three centres are intended to provide accommodation, in the event of nuclear attack, for the regional Headquarters for Northern Ireland headed by a Government Minister, and for four area teams led by senior civil servants. Each will comprise representatives from all the essential services, from Northern Ireland Departments, and from industry. They would have the necessary expertise to restore day-to-day services to the whole community in the Province.

Nominations are made on the basis of the experience of the individual, who is often a key postholder, but regard is also paid to health and other factors which might inhibit performance under extreme conditions.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to ensure that those people in the three proposed new nuclear shelters, in the event of a nuclear attack, will be a broadly representative cross-section of the Northern Ireland community.

Mr. Scott: Civil defence concerns all members of the community. The selection of civil defence personnel both for the three buildings in question and all other civil defence functions must be solely on the basis of their expertise and usefulness to the community in an emergency situation.

So far as volunteers are concerned, for example scientific advisers, every effort will be made to ensure that these come from all sections of the community.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost of the three proposed new nuclear shelters; and from what vote the necessary funds will come.

Mr. Scott: The cost of the three proposed civil defence control centres is expected to be in the region of £7 million spread over several years. The project will be funded from the Northern Ireland law, order, protective and miscellaneous services Vote.

Mentally Handicapped Adults

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement detailing the number of mentally handicapped adults in the districts of Moyle, Ballymoney and Coleraine and current provision for them in adult training centres or social education centres detailing the levels of funding and staffing involved;

(2) what proposals there are to alter current provision for mentally handicapped adults in the districts of Moyle, Ballymoney and Coleraine; and what are their projected effects.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the Moyle, Ballymoney and Coleraine unit of management there are 349 registered mentally handicapped adults. Currently there are 45 adult training centre places available and in addition 90 places have been allocated to these adults in multi-client day centres.

There are 7½ whole time equivalent care staff employed in the adult training centre and expenditure for the facility amounted to £135,253 in the year ended 31 March, 1985. It is not possible to isolate either staffing numbers or expenditure directly attributable to the mentally handicapped adults in multi-client day centres.

So far as further provision is concerned in this unit of management an additional 10 adult training centre places will be available in the autumn for profoundly mentally handicapped people.

Great Seal

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which dignitaries are entitled to dispose of the Great Seal of Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement about its custody and possession.

Mr. Hurd: The Keeper of the Great Seal of Northern Ireland is the Secretary of State, as Her Majesty's principal officer in Northern Ireland. The Governor of Northern Ireland formerly had this responsibility. The seal is retained in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown for Northern Ireland.

Armagh Prison (Strip Searches)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a young offender suffered an epileptic fit while being stripped naked in Armagh prison on 31 December 1984.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1985]: No inmate suffered an epileptic fit while being strip-searched at Armagh prison on 31 December 1984. On 31 December 1984 a young offender, who was committed on 28 December 1984, fainted in the reception area during a routine fingerprinting session. The prison medical officer diagnosed the inmate as suffering from drug withdrawal symptoms, and appropriate medical treatment was provided.

Waiting Lists

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing for each district of the Eastern health and social services board, the number of people on waiting lists for each specialty for the last three years for which figures are available, together with the average length of time a patient had to wait.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1985]: Information in respect of the numbers of people is given in the following tables. Since the average length of time spent on a waiting list does not give a true picture of the distribution of waiting time, the tables give a breakdown of the total waiting list by time spent on the list.

Figures for 1982 are incomplete due to industrial action in the health service.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Quotas

7. Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made in devising a scheme to meet the problems of the dairy quota tribunal hard cases which have been referred to him.

Mr. Jopling: In consultation with the industry organisations I have been looking at how best to use the limited amount of quota remaining available to help hard cases and I expect to make an announcement shortly.

Common Agricultural Policy

8. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusions he has reached about the operation of the common agricultural policy following this month's meeting of the Agriculture Council.

Mr. Jopling: I hope that the Commission's new paper "Perspectives for the Common Agricultural Policy" will lead to agreement on a more realistic and cost-effective policy.

13. Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet his European Economic Community counterparts to discuss further reform of the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Council of Ministers expects to have a first discussion of the Commission's recently published consultation paper in September.

25. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the proposals on strict budgetary discipline of the common agricultural policy spending is planned to reduce in future years the current annual provision for the storage, dumping and distribution of food surpluses; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The financial guideline for agriculture, which was adopted as part of the Council's conclusions on budget discipline, is designed to ensure that market support expenditure as a whole, including the cost of storing and disposing of surpluses, will grow more slowly than the Community's own resources base.

Young Farmers

12. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further proposals he has to assist young farmers.

Mrs. Fenner: On Monday 8 July my right hon. Friend laid before Parliament the draft Agriculture Improvement Regulations 1985. If approved these will provide a special increase of a quarter in the rate of grant payable to suitably qualified young farmers who carry out a farm improvement plan.

Salmon and Wild Trout

17. Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the state of salmon and wild trout fishing.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department is in regular contact with the water authorities, which are responsible for the regulation and management of the salmon and wild trout fisheries in England and Wales, and I understand that the 1985 season has got off to a relatively good start. Because of high river flows in many areas migratory fish have penetrated much further upstream than is usual at this time of year and rod catches are generally higher than at this time last year.

Royal Research Ship Charles Darwin

18. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the level of contribution to the work of the royal research ship Charles Darwin, on fishing and marine biological research in 1984-85.

Mrs. Fenner: None.

Farming Industry

19. Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many full-time farmers have left the industry in the last six years.

Mr. Jopling: This information is not available, but the net loss in the United Kingdom of full-time farmers, partners and directors between 1979 and 1984 is about 13,000. Definitional changes in the agricultural census since 1979 and an element of estimation in the annual figures make it impossible to give a more precise number.

Pelagic Fisheries

20. Mr. Wallace asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to complete the review of the restrictive licensing arrangements in respect of the pelagic fisheries.

Mr. Jopling: I hope that it will be possible for the necessary preparatory work and consultations with the industry to be completed in time for decisions to be reached before the end of the year.

Research, Development and Advisory Service

21. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further representations he has received about the effects of the planned cut in the funding of agricultural research and advice.

Mr. Jopling: Following the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean) on 24 May, my officials are now consulting all sectors of the industry on the future funding of agricultural research and development.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received on the proposals to reduce funding available for research, development and advisory services to the agriculture industry.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) earlier today.

Agricultural Land

22. Mr. Adley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will take steps to protect agricultural land in Dorset; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government remain committed to their policy for the protection of agricultural land. My Ministry will continue to ensure through its involvement in the planning process that proper account is taken of this policy in planning decisions in Dorset and elsewhere.

Livestock Markets

23. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is yet in a position to announce his conclusions on the report of the Farm Animal Welfare Council on the conditions of animals at livestock markets; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The council is still engaged on its review of all the welfare aspects of livestock markets and I am unable to say when it will be ready to send its report to Agriculture Ministers.

Industrial Fishing Vessels

24. Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received concerning the issue of industrial fishing vessels carrying both a 16 mm net and an 80 mm net.

Mr. Jopling: The Scottish Fishermen's Federation has recently suggested the introduction into the Community regulation on technical conservation measures of a requirement to ensure that fishing vessels carrying small mesh nets to fish for industrial purposes should not be allowed at the same time to carry larger mesh nets to fish for human consumption. The Community regulation already provides that all catches taken by a vessel with small and large mesh nets on board shall be regarded as having been taken with the small mesh nets unless the logbook records show otherwise. We shall bear the SFF suggestion in mind in any Community discussion of the rules on industrial fishing.

Fish Farms

26. Mr. Key asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the level of professional veterinary care and monitoring of fish farms producing food for human consumption with specific reference to the use of antibiotics under the Veterinary Surgeons Act 1966 and the Medicines Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Medicinal products containing antibiotics as an active ingredient for use on fish are subject to the same requirements of the Medicines Act 1968 as are other animal medicines. Ministers responsible for licensing medicinal products must satisfy themselves as to the products' safety, quality and efficacy. Safety for the consumer is also taken into consideration where there is a possibility of residues in animals including fish produced for food. My Department is conducting a survey to assess levels of antimicrobial agents in the edible tissues of trout.

Cereals

27. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is taking any steps to encourage farmers to reduce their acreage of winter cereals for 1985-86.

Mr. Jopling: Measures of this kind would be a matter for the Community as a whole. There are no proposals currently in discussion in the Community designed specifically to reduce the area of any type of cereals.

31. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the cereal price for 1985-86 has been finally settled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) and for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory).

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further consideration he has given in conjunction with his European Community counterparts to the reduction of European Community cereal production.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave yesterday in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean).

Outgoers Scheme

28. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling: Since we re-opened the outgoers scheme on 10 June, 102 producers have expressed an interest in participating. Not all of these will necessarily decide in the end to go out of milk production, but 30, with 9 million litres of quota, have applied to become outgoers. Of these, two have already ceased production and the remainder are being invited to join the scheme. This is in addition to some 265 million litres of quota which have already been committed under the scheme in England and Wales. Additional participants will be accepted into the scheme on a first come-first served basis until the target of 289 million litres has been reached.

Pesticide 2,4,5-T

29. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has had as to the use of 2,4,5-T.

Mrs. Fenner: We have correspondence relating to the case of Anna Noon, to which we will be replying when the investigations referred to by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in her reply of 1 July are completed.

Salmon Drift Netting

30. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the incidence of salmon drift netting off the English coast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Salmon drift netting is and has for a long time been permitted in certain areas of English coastal waters, principally those off the north-east coast. The regulation of these fisheries is the responsibility of the relevant water authorities and the number of licensed nets permitted in each area in limited by orders made by these authorities. In 1984 the numbers of salmon drift net licences issued by each of the English water authorities concerned were as follows:

Northumbrian Water Authority	— 121 (for coastal waters)
Yorkshire Water Authority	— 29 (for coastal waters)
North West Water Authority	— 4 (for coastal waters off Cumbria)
	6 (for the Ribble estuary)
	10 (for the Lune estuary)
South West Water Authority	— 7 (for the Camel estuary).

Hops

Mr. Rowe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farms in England and Wales were in hop production in 1975, 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mrs. Fenner: The data available are as follows:

	Holdings
1975	484
1980	415
1984	380

A figure for 1985 is not yet available.

Sugar

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the current different support and other prices for sugar in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy and the corresponding prices in the world market.

Mr. MacGregor: The effective support price for white sugar in the United Kingdom is currently 59·64 ECU/100 kg (£368·97/tonne). The world sugar market is a residual and highly volatile one but the London daily price for white sugar, which may be regarded as representative of the world price, was 130·5 US dollars (£94·16) per tonne on 15 July 1985.

New Potatoes

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the tonnage of new potatoes imported into the United Kingdom so far in 1985, and from which countries.

Mr. MacGregor: Imports of new potatoes between 1 January and 31 May 1985, the latest period for which official Her Majesty's Customs and Excise statistics are available, are as follows:

	Tonnes
Total	137,393
of which from:
Egypt	58,289
Spain	40,059
Cyprus	25,854
Canary Islands	6,495
France	2,598
Italy	1,870
Israel	1,010
Greece	490
Others	728

Agricultural Expenditure (EC)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any expenditure on income support, as opposed to price support, for EEC farmers under the common agricultural policy will be subject to the limits on agricultural expenditure under the new procedure for financial discipline; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: In its consultation paper "Perspectives for the CAP", the Commission has expressed the view that some form of direct income support in agriculture might be introduced as a complement to the continuation of a restrictive CAP prices policy. The Commission has not yet made any specific proposals for income support. If it did so any resulting expenditure would be covered by the Council of Ministers' conclusions on budgetary discipline.

Food Labelling

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has had from the sugar industry in regard to nutritional food labelling.

Mrs. Fenner: Draft guidelines for nutritional labelling were circulated to all interested parties on 27 March. I have received many written comments, including those of the sugar bureau and British Sugar plc.

Meat Consumption

Sir David Price asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the trend in red meat and white meat consumption, respectively in the United Kingdom over the last 10 years.

Mrs. Fenner: Consumption of red meat (beef and veal, sheepmeat and pigmeat) in the United Kingdom is provisionally estimated at 2·9 million tonnes in 1984 compared with 3·2 million tonnes in 1974, a decline of slightly less than 1 per cent. per annum. Consumption of poultrymeat has increased from 0·7 million tonnes in 1974 to an estimated 0·9 million tonnes in 1984, a rise of nearly 3 per cent. per annum.

Smallholdings

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each year since 1966 (a) the total area held by local authorities for smallholdings purposes, (b) the area let as smallholdings, (c) the total number of smallholdings provided and (d) the average size of local authority smallholdings.

Mrs. Fenner: The information is available in this form only from 1969-70. Details of the position in England are as follows:

Import Levies

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current levels of import levies, expressed in pence per pound, on butter, beef, flour, sugar and cheese, respectively.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is set out in the following table:

Import levy applicable in the United Kingdom on 16 July 1985

p/lb

Commodity	Levy applicable in United Kingdom
Butter (82 per cent. fat)*	66·9
Cheese (Cheddar)*	53·6
Beef and veal†	69·0
Wheatflour	5·4
Sugar (white)‡	14·1

Notes

* In practice, special quota arrangements apply to most imports of butter and cheese from third countries, allowing entry at reduced rates of levy. Under these schemes a levy of 24·6p/lb would apply in the case of 80 per cent. fat butter imported from New Zealand and a levy of 4·2p/lb would apply to Cheddar cheese imported from New Zealand and Australia under the quota arrangements.

† The rates vary according to tariff heading and country of origin. The rate of carcase meat (tariff heading 02.01AIIa1) from third countries other than Austria, Switzerland or Sweden is quoted. In practice, most beef imports from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced rates of levy.

‡ In practice, the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are generally covered by the Lome Convention and enter the Community levy free.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of regulations, aids to industry, or industrial practices, within his Department's responsibilities, which have had to be cleared with or which have been challenged by the European Economic Community Commission since May 1979 under the European Economic Community treaties, together with the outcome;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of legislative or other provisions within his Department's responsibility which have had to be cleared with, or which have been challenged by, the European Economic Community Commission under the European Economic Community treaties, together with the outcome.

Mr. Jopling: State aids are notified to the Commission under article 93(3) of the EC treaty. The Commission sometimes asks for additional information but the only aids within my Department's responsibility that have been formally challenged under article 93(2) procedure since May 1979 are:

Fish Producers' Organisations Subsidy Scheme.

Fishing Vessels Temporary Support Scheme 1980.

Fishing Vessels Temporary Support Scheme 1981.

Fishing Vessels (Temporary Financial Assistance) Scheme 1982.

Sea Fish Industry Development Programme.

United Kingdom legislation implementing Community measures is notified to the Commission (and is open to its scrutiny). A detailed list of every measure so notified could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

TRANSPORT

British Rail Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the number of former British Rail Engineering Ltd. employees at Shildon who were placed in employment by the British Rail Engineering Ltd. holding company set up for this purpose.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that British Rail Engineering's three-year programme with the Shildon and Sedgefield development agency has already created 365 new jobs since it started at the end of last year. About 145 of these have been taken up by former BREL employees. The firms already assisted by BREL offer a potential for a total of 870 jobs over the next three years. I welcome this achievement by BREL and the local agencies involved.

Freight Trains (Timekeeping)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the timekeeping of freight trains on the British Rail network, and as to the causes of delays in each of the last three years.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter of management for British Rail.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he was consulted by the British Railways Board before the decision was taken to close the British Railways Engineering Ltd. workshops at Swindon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The decision is a management matter for the British Railways Board and British Rail Engineering Limited, who informed me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in advance, before putting a proposal for closure to their trades unions for consultation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Lecturers

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the maximum of the university lecturer grade represents as a proportion of average earnings in this country; if he will list the salaries of the equivalent level in universities in the United States of America, Japan, West Germany, Canada, France, the Netherlands and Australia; and what these represent as a proportion of average earnings in those countries.

Sir Keith Joseph: The maximum of the lecturer grade in universities in Great Britain stands at £14,925 with effect from 1 April 1984 which represents 1·8 times the average annual earnings at that date. Information on university lecturers salaries in the other countries mentioned is not available.

Higher Education

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will lodge in the Library such submissions as have been made on the recent Green Paper on higher education; and if he will list all bodies and organisations which have made such submissions.

Mr. Brooke: No. Bodies and individuals submitting comments on the Green Paper on higher education must decide for themselves whether to publish them and if so how.

Science Budget

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the planned figures, in 1985 terms, for the next three years for the science budget for universities, polytechnics and the National Advisory Board institutions in the public sector.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's expenditure plans for higher education from 1985-86 to 1987-88 are set out in Cmnd. 9428: figures for the local authority sector for 1986-87 are provisional only and for 1987-88 cannot yet be disaggregated from overall totals for local authority spending on education. In no sector of higher education is it possible to allocate planned expenditure between science and other subject areas. Universities and public sector institutions will also receive funding from the research councils for specific projects: total planned expenditure is given in Cmnd. 9428 but it is not possible to say in advance what sums will be allocated to universities and public sector institutions.

"Geology and Wealth: the Future"

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he intends to make to the report entitled, "Geology and Wealth: the Future", prepared by a committee under the chairmanship of the president of the Institution of Geologists, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is not yet in a position to respond. If any substantive response is made my hon. Friend will be sent a copy of it in due course.

British Geological Survey

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for the City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) has made to the letter to him dated 13 June from Professor D. M. Kürsten of the Federal Institute for Geosciences and Natural Resources in Hanover, criticising the inclusion within the scope of the Natural Environment Research Council of the British geological survey.

Mr. Brooke: I have replied as follows:

Thank you for your letter of 13 June about the British Geological Survey (BGS).

I understand that it is generally true that in other countries the equivalent of the geological survey is organised differently than in this country. The present chain from central Government to BGS may seem long but it has parallels in other parts of publicly funded research and allied activities. It is only recently that the arrangement has been questioned and many believe that it has worked well over the years.

Much of the unease within BGS stems from the publication of NERC's corporate plan on 14 February 1985. All the research councils have been encouraged to produce corporate plans by both this Department and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. I have given my full support to these moves as the production of a corporate plan is a valuable tool in the Government's financial management initiative and the development of greater efficiency and value for money in the public sector. The plan is essentially a document prepared by management explaining how a council intends to pursue its objectives with the resources available.

The NERC and the ABRC are well aware of the problems relating to the funding of the BGS and they are paying particular attention to them.

Your offer to evaluate and review the work of the BGS has been noted.

Thank you for your interest.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has made to the letter to him dated 24 June from Dr. V. S. Colter of Plascom Ltd. regarding the surveying work of the British geological survey.

Mr. Brooke: The Department's reply made the following points:

1. A few years ago some 80 per cent. of British Geological Survey (BGS) expenditure had been met by commissioned receipts. By the 1983-84 financial year this had fallen to 61 per cent. and is continuing to decline.

2. Over a similar period, following advice from the advisory Board for the Research Councils, the NERC share of the science budget had gone down slightly apart from a specific increase for Antarctic research. This decrease, though slight, had compounded the effects of the reduction in commissioned research income.

3. There was little potential for making good the shortfall in commissioned funds for geology by an increase in the science Vote contribution though this had been done by NERC in 1982-83 and 1983-84.

4. The reduction in commissioned funds had particularly affected those programmes of a strategic nature such as the systematic regional geological survey of the United Kingdom landmass, which had been funded by a consortium of customer departments until that consortium had been disbanded in 1981. Since then, regional geological surveying had been supported primarily from the science budget.

5. The letter repeated an assurance given by Mr. Hugh Fish, chairman of NERC, that a geological survey will remain an essential part of the council's programme.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will invite the chairmen of the Advisory Board for Research Councils and the Natural Environment Research Council to an early meeting with him to discuss the report by the Royal Society's working party on geophysics research, with a view to remedial action; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: No. I understand, however that the chairman of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils has agreed with the Chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council that the issues raised in the report of the Royal Society's working party on the support of geophysics in the United Kingdom should be discussed by the advisory board in October this year.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will invite the chairmen of the Advisory Board for Research Councils and the Natural Environment Research Council to an early meeting with him to discuss the independence of the proposed inquiry into geological surveying and its terms of reference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: While my right hon. Friend is aware that the Advisory Board for the Research Councils (ABRC) and the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) are proposing to set up a study into geological surveying work, the composition of the study team is a matter for the ABRC and the NERC. This also applies to the terms of reference, though my right hon. Friend is broadly aware that the group will consider the need for, the resources required to provide for the appropriate responsibilities for paying for geological surveying in the United Kingdom.

Biology Students

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received recently about alternatives to dissection in courses for biology students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has not received any recent representations about alternatives to dissection for biology courses in schools. Decisions on the use of alternative material are for the schools themselves; the Government have no plans to seek to issue guidance on this matter.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Telecommunications (Network Services)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if telex store and forward services will continue to be considered a value added network service under new licencing requirements.

Mr. Pattie: The Government's proposals for the future licensing of value added and data services are set out in their consultative document published on 6 June, copies of which are in the Library. Comments on these proposals have been invited by 31 July and the proposals will then be reviewed in the light of the comments received.

Libya

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about trade relations with Libya.

Mr. Channon: In the first five months of 1985, United Kingdom exports to Libya (fob) were valued at £105,778,000 and United Kingdom imports from Libya (cif) at £107,972,000.

Paper and Board Imports

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the quantity of imports of paper and board into the United Kingdom from the rest of the EEC in 1983 and 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The United Kingdom imported 770,000 tonnes of paper and paperboard from the rest of the European Community in 1983, and 852,000 tonnes in 1984.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what steps she is taking to persuade the European Economic Community to reduce expenditure; and if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage increase in European Economic Community spending since 1980, the percentage increase in the United Kingdom gross contribution, and the percentage increase in spending under the United Kingdom budget.

The Prime Minister: In accordance with the Council's conclusions on budget discipline, the 9 June ECOFIN Council reached an agreement by qualified majority to fix the reference framework for Community expenditure in 1986 at 29·7 billion ecu (about £17 billion). Within the framework, agricultural expenditure is constrained by the financial guideline, which requires that agricultural guarantee spending should increase by less than the rate of growth of the own resources base.

The information requested is set out. The increase in the United Kingdom's gross contributions to the European Economic Community does not take account of the offsetting effect of the rebates it has received. These rebates effectively reduce the total gross payments during the period 1980 to 1984 by about 25 per cent. In addition, the United Kingdom will benefit from an abatement of its 1985 VAT payments of 1000 Mecu in respect of its excessive contribution to the 1984 Community budget. The calendar year is not an accounting period for the purposes of United Kingdom public expenditure. Information on the percentage increase in spending under the United Kingdom budget is available only for financial years.

(i) Percentage increase in European Community spending between 1980 and 1984—68·4 per cent.
(ii) Percentage increase in the United Kingdom's gross contribution between 1980 and 1984—74·1 per cent.
(iii) Percentage increase in United Kingdom General Government expenditure for the financial years 1980-81 to 1984-85—38 per cent.

Figures derived from the following sources

(i) and (ii) European Community Court of Auditors report (final budget figures and actual own resources) and the supplementary and amending budget No. 1 of 1984.
(iii) Public expenditure White Paper — Cmnd. 9428, and FSBR—HC 265.

Geological Survey

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister what response she has made to the letter to her dated 24 April from Sir Peter Kent, F.R.S., about the inclusion within the scope of the Natural Environment Research Council of the British geological survey.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science replied to Sir Peter Kent's letter on my behalf. He said that there is general agreement about the need for geological surveying, both to underpin basic research in the earth sciences and because of its practical relevance. He referred to the recent reductions in the funds received by the Natural Environment Research Council for commissioned research. He explained that it was primarily this reduction, and future prospects on the level of support from Departments, that had led the Advisory Board for the Research Councils (ABRC) to conclude that a study of geological surveying should be carried out.

I understand that the study will be jointly set up by the ABRC and the NERC and will look into the need for, the resources required to provide, and the appropriate responsibilities for paying for geological surveying in the United Kingdom. The group's report will be submitted to the chairmen of these bodies.

NATIONAL FINANCE

North Sea Oil

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much revenue from North Sea oil will be reduced in the current financial year compared with the estimate if the current £ sterling price is maintained for the rest of the financial year.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) on 27 June 1985 at column 489.

Married Women

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated number of earning wives and (a) the number of taxpaying wives ranged by the couples' joint taxable income and of wives ranged by wife's income, on the same basis as in his predecessor's written answer dated 28 March 1983, Official Report, column 59;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table on the lines of his predecessor's written answer dated 28 March 1983, Official Report, column 59, showing the number and cost of wife's earnings election at various levels of joint total income under the existing tax régime and under an alternative which provided for (a) an increase in married and single allowances to £4,500 and £2,250, respectively, (b) two reduced rate bands of £1,000 at 10 per cent. and 20 per cent., respectively, (c) a standard rate band of £5,000 at 30 per cent. followed by (d) three higher rate bands of £4,000 and four of £5,000 all in 5 percentage point steps, but making no provision for any other allowances.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Friendly Societies

Mr. Burt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will be consulting the representative bodies of the various groups of societies for which the registry of friendly societies is responsible about the proposed fees to recover its full costs.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government have already indicated in the Green Paper "Building Societies: A New Framework" that the registry's powers to charge fees should be extended so that it can recover its full costs from the groups of societies for which it is responsible. The necessary provision for charges to building societies will be included in the forthcoming building society legislation. The Government are considering whether to include provisions in respect of the other groups of societies in the same legislation or whether to provide for it when there is next legislation affecting other groups of societies. I can assure my hon. Friend that before the orders setting out the fee scales are drafted, there will be consultations on the structure of the scales required to achieve the objective of full recovery of costs in respect of each group.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the payment in July of June non-value added tax own resources to the European Communities.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In accordance with article 10(2) of Council regulation 2891/77, the Commission has invited member states to pay on 22 July instead of 20 August non-VAT own resources collected in June. These own resources consist of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties. The Government are complying with this request.

An amount not exceeding £118·4 million will be paid on 22 July; the payment of levies and duties on 20 August 1985 which is made under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972 will be reduced by an appropriate amount. There will therefore be no net addition to public expenditure.

Banking Supervision

Mr. Cash asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how consultation is to be conducted on the report of the committee set up to consider the system of banking supervision, Cmnd. 9550.

Mr. Lawson: The Bank of England is publishing today two consultative papers, one entitled "Banking Act 1979: Proposals for Legislative Change" and the other "Large Exposures Undertaken by Institutions Authorised Under the Banking Act 1979." Copies of these papers have been sent to all institutions authorised under the Banking Act 1979, and to the main banking associations. The Bank of England has also invited representations from any interested individuals, institutions or representative bodies.

Copies of the two papers have been placed in the Library of the House. A third paper, on the proposed new arrangements between the Bank of England supervisors and the auditors of authorised institutions will be published by the bank shortly, and also placed in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Repairs

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many of the category C repairs, which have been reported in the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's Antrim district area, are subject to a planned maintenance scheme; and how many such schemes have been initiated in this area in the list three years;

(2) what criteria are used in assessing whether requests for repairs by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive should be categorised as (a) essential or (b) non-essential; and at what level of qualifications such decisions are taken within the Northern Ireland Housing Executive;

(3) how many of the category C repairs, which have been reported in the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's number 2 Newtownabbey district area are subject to a planned maintenance scheme; and how many such schemes have been initiated in this area, in the last three years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available. I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Clifford v. Eastern Health and Social Services Board

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General when, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Belfast, South on 11 July about the cost to public funds of the case of Clifford v. Eastern Health and Social Services Board, he will be in a position to state what was the cost of legal aid in that case.

The Attorney-General: In about October of this year.

Legal Aid Certificates

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Belfast, South on 11 July about legal aid certificates, what was the cost to public funds of the certificates issued in the five-year period 1980 to 1985 in cases alleging medical negligence.

The Attorney-General: The information requested by the hon. Gentleman is not readily available because the cases involved may not be concluded for a number of years. However, the cost to the legal aid fund of cases alleging medical negligence which were concluded, reported and paid in the past five years is as follows:

	Total cases concluded	Cost to Legal Aid Fund
1980-81	20	13,189·70
1981-82	22	4,870·33
1982-83	26	30,781·71
1983-84	34	30,200·85
1984-85	46	32,432·59

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Belfast, South on 11 July about legal aid certificates, in how many cases in which the outcome was a withdrawal the judge asked for or directed that the case should be withdrawn.

The Attorney-General: The statistics requested by the hon. Gentleman are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Crown Prosecutor System

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General how many Crown prosecutors the Director of Public Prosecutions proposes to appoint in Wales; where their offices will be situated; and if he will make a statement concerning the structure and establishment of the Crown prosecutor system in Wales.

The Attorney-General: Pursuant to section 1(4) of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 the Director of Public Prosecutions proposes to divide Wales into two areas, one encompassing the South Wales and Gwent police districts and the other covering the North Wales and Dyfed-Powys police districts. The Director will shortly designate a person to be chief Crown prosecutor for each area as required by the subsection. Decisions on the location of offices have not yet been taken, since these will be primarily the responsibility of persons designated as chief Crown prosecutors. The exact numbers of Crown prosecutors required in the two areas are not yet known.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Suicides)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of suicides of (a) men and (b) women in prisons in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The number of prisoners who died in Prison Department custody in England and Wales and upon whom a verdict of suicide was passed is as follows:

	Number
1980	21
1981	16
1982	*18
1983	†21
1984	†23

* Including one person who died while on bail not having recovered from an attempt to commit suicide while in prison custody.

† Including in each year one prisoner who died in an outside hospital following a suicide attempt made before his reception into prison custody.

All were males.

I regret that the figures given in a reply to a question from my hon. Friend, the Member for Leicester East (Mr. Bruinvels), on 18 June, at column 89, were incorrect.

Prison Governors

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met prison governors; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend last met prison governors as a group when he addressed their annual conference on 5 November 1984. But my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State had a wide ranging discussion about current issues, including overcrowding and resource matters, when he met representatives of the governor's branch of the Society of Civil and Public Servants on 25 June 1985, and my right hon. and learned Friend will be meeting representatives of the branch shortly, quite apart from the numerous meetings he has had with individual Governors on a wide variety of occasions.

Pornography

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department keeps a record of cases in which a judge or court found that indulgence by the accused in pornographic material was a contributory factor in the commission by him or her of a sexual offence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend would naturally take careful account of any suggestion made to him by a judge or magistrate that pornographic material had contributed to the commission of an offence. Courts are not, however, required to reach findings concerning the factors which have led to an offence, or to announce any conclusion that they may reach. There is therefore no basis for the maintenance of a complete or accurate record.

Prisoners' Letters (Censoring)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy towards the censoring of letters to and from prisoners in prisons in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The policy concerning prisoners' correspondence is set out in standing order 5, which has been published and a copy of which is in the Library.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out figures for Twickenham to show in respect of the first quarter of 1984 and the first quarter of 1985 the total number of notifiable crimes recorded and the numbers of crimes cleared up and not cleared up in each of the following categories: (a) violence against the person, (b) sexual offences, (c) robbery, (d) burglary, (e) theft and handling of stolen goods, (f) fraud and forgery, (g) criminal damage and (h) other notifiable offences.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 8 May 1985 at columns 410-411 about the statistics of notifiable offences recorded and cleared up in each borough or outer London district in the metropolitan police district which are being placed in the Library with effect from the first quarter of 1985. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the corresponding information for the first quarter of 1984 for the London borough of Richmond (which includes Twickenham) is as given in the following table. Quarterly statistics by offence group for areas smaller than boroughs are usually too small and variable to provide worthwhile comparison.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in the London Borough of Richmond in the first quarter of 1984

	First Quarter 1984
Violence against the person	78
Sexual offences	9
Robbery	13
Burglary	607
Theft and handling stolen goods	1,357
Fraud and forgery	197
Criminal damage	416
Other notifiable offences	9
Total	2,684

Crowd Safety and Control Report

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mr. Justice Popplewell will be presenting his interim report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The interim report of the Committee of Inquiry into Crowd Safety and Control at Sportsgrounds has been received and will be published before the House rises.

Emergency Centres

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those local authorities which have since 1 December 1983 received approvals for grant aid for the purpose of establishing, equipping or maintaining an emergency centre pursuant to regulation 5(1)(c) of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those local authorities which have since 1 December 1983 received approvals for grant aid for the purpose of establishing, equipping or maintaining an emergency centre pursuant to regulation 4(1)(b) of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Addicts and Alcoholics

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the annual increase in the number of registered drug addicts and registered alcoholics since 1975.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the number of narcotic drug addicts notified to the Home Office in the years 1975 to 1983 is given in table 9 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs in the United Kingdom, 1983". (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 18/84). The only information currently available for 1984 was given in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 June 1985 at columns 394-95. There is no requirement to register alcoholics.

Greater Manchester (Community Relations)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester on the use of special branch officers of the Greater Manchester police to take part in community relations activities, and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985, c. 72]: I am informed by the chief constable that the task of maintaining and developing good community relations is integrated into the work of all parts of his force, under the co-ordination of the force community relations branch. The position of special branch officers in this respect is no different from that of other members of the force. The chief constable further informs me that the work of his special branch is carried out within the terms of the Home Office guidelines on the work of a special branch, issued on 19 December 1984 and reproduced on pages (x) to (xiii) of the fourth report from the Home Affairs Select Committee (Session 1984-85).

Prisoners (Early Release)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prisoners who had received sentences ranging from 20 to 25 years, 15 to 20 years, 10 to 15 years, five to 10 years and two and a half to five years were granted early releases in each single year since 1979; and what effect this has had on the total of the prison population.

Mr. Mellor: [pursuant to his reply, 21 June 1985, c. 227]: The readily available information is given in the following table. Information on the number of persons on parole supervised by the probation service for each year since 1979 is published in "Probation Statistics, England and Wales" (table 1·2 of the latest issue, for 1983).

*Persons recommended for parole as a proportion of all persons discharged * from prison department establishments by length of sentence*

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Albania

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Albania.

Mr. Rifkind: We have no diplomatic relations with Albania. We formally notified the Albanian Government in 1980 that we were ready to re-establish diplomatic relations without preconditions. As we have made clear, this offer remains open, but regrettably the Albanian Government have not taken it up.

Afghanistan

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Afghanistan.

Mr. Renton: We do not have normal Government to Government dealings with the regime in Kabul which depends on an occupying army of over 115,000 Soviet troops.

Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 336, if he will (a) explain the outcome of his meeting with non-governmental organisations on the non-proliferation treaty (b) state whether he plans any further meetings with non-governmental organisations on the non-proliferation treaty before the review conference and (c) state whether his Department intends to provide financial support to non-governmental organisations to attend the non-proliferation treaty review conference.

Mr. Luce: We have had several useful exchanges of view with non-governmental organisations. At all of them there has been general agreement that the non-proliferation treaty must be sustained and strengthened.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will continue to keep in touch with non-governmental organisations during the approach to the review conference.

There are unfortunately no official funds available to assist non-governmental organisations to attend the review conference.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Skoal Bandits

Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will prosecute those involved in selling Skoal Bandits to children under 16 years of age under the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1983.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The sale of this product to a person under 16 years of age may constitute an offence under section 18 of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937. Whether or not criminal proceedings are appropriate will depend upon the facts and circumstances of individual cases.

SCOTLAND

Broadleaf Woodlands

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is his intention to make a statement on broadleaf woodlands policy before the management guidelines are agreed by all the parties concerned.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend hopes to make a statement on broadleaves policy to the House before the summer recess. Discussions on the details of the management guidelines for broadleaved woodlands may not be completed by the time that statement is made.

Scottish Office Centenary

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much it will cost to celebrate the Scottish Office's centenary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: To mark its centenary the Scottish Office is holding a public exhibition in Inverleith House, Edinburgh from 4 July to 31 August and has arranged for the publication of a history of the Office entitled "The Thistle and the Crown". In addition I have arranged receptions for previous Ministers in the Scottish Office, past and serving members of staff and others connected with the Office. The costs directly related to the exhibition will be about £30,000: and the total expenditure is likely to be rather less than £45,000, which I believe will be money well spent.

Education Schemes (Unemployed)

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the schemes for educational provision for unemployed adults in Scotland; and what funds are made available for such schemes.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Such information is not held centrally. Education for the unemployed is a matter for local authorities and provision for this purpose is made as part of the normal arrangements under which resources are made available to the local authorities.

Skoal Bandits

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding has been provided out of public sources for the establishment of a factory to manufacture Skoal Bandits in East Kilbride; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Having taken a decision on commercial grounds to manufacture Skoal Bandits in Europe, US Tobacco International is eligible for the normal range of regional support for its new facility at East Kilbride. In accordance with normal practice, details of any grant payment exceeding £25,000 will be published in "British Business" in the quarter following the payment of grant.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that Skoal Bandits are treated in the same way as other tobacco products in relation to their advertisement and promotion.

Mr. Allan Stewart: US Tobacco International Inc, the manufacturer of Skoal Bandits, has entered into a voluntary agreement with the Government covering the marketing and promotion of the product. In terms of this agreement, which runs until 31 December 1987, the company has undertaken to restrict the scope and content of the advertising, the media on which it is placed and the audience at which it is directed. In addition, the chief medical officer has written to all medical practitioners to advise of the dangers of snuff dipping in this country.

Lochaline Area

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the nature, extent and timescale of drilling operations near Lochaline on the sound of Mull; by whom they are being undertaken; whether planning permission had been granted prior to the commencement of operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Neither I nor Highland regional council, to whom applications for planning permission would be made, have any knowledge of drilling operations in the Lochaline area. If the hon. Member has any information about such operations, perhaps he would send it to me and I shall have further enquiries made.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the total numbers of employees in employment at the most recent date for which figures are available and in 1974, 1978, 1981 and 1984, respectively, for (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment in (i) Scotland, (ii) each Scottish region and (iii) each district council area in Strathclyde region; and if he will give the figures in terms of the standard industrial classification used in censuses of employment in 1968 and 1980.

Mr. Younger: The available estimates of the total numbers of full and part time employees in employment, in thousands, are set out in the following tables. The estimates for areas within Scotland are based on figures for employment office areas; estimates for 1984 and 1985 are provisional.

Unemployment Schemes

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will specify schemes for the long-term unemployed in the west of Scotland which will replace the courses at present run at the re-establishment centre at Bishopbriggs.

Mr. Allan Stewart: A number of schemes run by the Manpower Services Commission (MSC) will provide such opportunities. The community programme offers temporary employment for long-term unemployed adults on projects of benefit to the community. The voluntary projects programme provides unemployed people with constructive, voluntary activities. The enterprise allowance scheme helps unemployed people to start up their own businesses. Through its adult training programmes, MSC also provides work preparation training to improve employability. In addition MSC's employment rehabilitation centres at Bellshill and Hillington offer courses of assessment and rehabilitation, primarily for disabled people but with places available for the able-bodied also.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will extend the exemptions from the eligibility rules for the community programme so as to permit persons who have been in work during the preceding six months to take up unfilled vacancies in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No, the eligibility conditions are intended to direct help to those most in need and we believe the present unemployment criteria for entry to the programme strikes broadly the right balance in achieving that intention. We believe the programme to be on target for its growth to 230,000 filled places by June 1986.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his most recent estimate of the proportion of B1 places on youth training schemes taken up in 1984-85; and what target figure the Government propose for similar courses in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Rail Engineering Ltd. (Swindon)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment if Her Majesty's Government have prepared any estimate of the effects on local spending power of redundancies arising from the closure of the British Rail Engineering Ltd. workshops at Swindon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It would not be possible to produce reliable estimates as there are too many uncertain factors involved. Much will depend on the success of efforts to attract new business and employment to the area. British Rail Engineering Ltd. has already made £1¼ million available for this purpose in the form of grants and loan guarantees.

Labour Statistics

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were out of work in the Batley and Spen parliamentary constituency at the most recent count; and what was the comparable figure for the same area in the same month in 1975.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is available in the Library. On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the Batley and Spen constituency was 5,213. Statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies are derived from the new ward-based system and are available from June 1983.

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report in relation to counties in England and Wales (a) wholly or substantially to the north-west of a line drawn between the Wash and the Bristol channel and (b) wholly or substantially to the south-east a line the figures for current unemployment showing (i) county by county and in aggregate the total numbers unemployed (ii) such numbers expressed as a percentage of the potential work force, (iii) the numbers and proportion of such unemployed people classified as long-term unemployed, (iv) the numbers and proportion of such unemployed people as are under 25 years and (v) the numbers and proportion of such unemployed under the age of 25 years as have been out of work for six months and 12 months, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am sending a copy of a computer printout giving the requested information for April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis by age and duration is available. This information is also available from the Library.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are being taken to provide additional equipment grants and help with staff salaries to enable information technology centres to continue to work.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Charitable Housing

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost to public funds of discounts to tenants of charitable housing associations in 1984-85; and what is the likely cost in 1985-86.

Sir George Young: The cost to public funds of the home-ownership scheme in 1984-85 was £3·45 million out of an allocation of £10 million. It is too early to give a precise estimate of the costs of the scheme in 1985-86. Provision for the year is £17 million, to which will be added the underspend on the scheme last year.

Gannets

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which article or annex of directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds authorises either the taking of gannets for human consumption or the sale of this species for human consumption; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Member states may make a derogation under article 9 from the provisions of articles 5, 6, 7 and 8. Such a derogation was made in 1984 and a licence issued permitting up to 2,000 gannets to be killed for home consumption.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the size of the Nature Conservancy Council budgets to cover (a) land purchase by voluntary bodies, (b) land management, education and promotion by voluntary bodies and (c) the small grants programme; and what limits upon maximum or minimum levels of grant or support have been set by him or his Department for each of the above categories.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations he has received at his London office, his regional office and in Parliament regarding the dumping of radioactive waste at Lumns Lane tip at Agecroft; if he will arrange for an inquiry to be held into the problems at the site; if he will meet again with objectors and local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since my previous answer to the hon. Member for Eccles on 15 January 1985 (vol. 71, c. 98) the Department has received 10 representations, five to Parliament and five to its London office, expressing concern about the disposal at Lumns Lane of low-level radioactive waste arising in Greater Manchester. These representations have been considered, but my right hon.

Friend remains satisfied that the authorised disposals can be safely and appropriately made. No occasion is seen to hold a public inquiry at this stage, or to reopen consideration of the matter.

Conservation

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has made available to local planning authorities in regard to their responsibilities towards sites of special scientific interest; and whether such advice provides details of directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds and the Berne convention.

Mr. Waldegrave: DOE circulars 108/77 and 32/81 contain advice to local planning authorities in regard to their responsibilities towards sites of special scientific interest. They do not contain details of Directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds or the Berne convention. We are currently reviewing the contents of these circulars.

Victim Support Schemes

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will grant disregard from targets and rate-capping for local authority-funded victim support schemes.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend will consider any representations to that effect which he receives.

Capital Allocations

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities underspent on their capital allocations for the financial year 1984-85.

Mr. Waldegrave: Out of 396 local authorities who have so far submitted capital payments returns for 1984-85, 39 have reported prescribed capital expenditure lower than their capital allocations.

Greater Manchester Council (Urban Programme)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain each decision in refusing the 10 applications submitted by Greater Manchester council for the urban programme 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Decisions were taken on the merits of the projects compared with those of others submitted by district councils.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring up to date the answer of 1 March 1984, Official Report, columns 330-31, concerning the Exchequer contribution to local government expenditure at settlement and outturn; and if he will estimate the cost in the current financial year if the outturn reaches 65 per cent.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's Government will make additional financial support available to local authorities to assist them in housing those single homeless young people who are currently affected by the social security board and lodgings regulations.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is looking at a range of measures — including some with financial implications—which might help to relieve homelessness generally and from which young people among others would stand to benefit. Our conclusions will be announced shortly.

EC (Water Quality)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce before 26 July his decision on applications to the European Community for derogations or time limits in respect of the European Economic Community directive on water quality; and if he will publish the derogations and time limits.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1985]: I shall write to the hon. Member before 26 July and I shall make the information public.

DEFENCE

Submarine Repairs (Faslane-Coulport)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many submarines have docked in the current year at the Faslane Coulport complex on the Clyde for repairs to be undertaken following possible collisions with other vessels.

Mr. Stanley: None.

MFV Mhari L

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received expressing concern about the cause of the sinking of the vessel MFV Mhari L; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Ministry of Defence Ministers have received two telephone calls from hon. Members and seven letters (five of them from hon. Members) in connection with the MFV Mhari L. As well as expressing concern about the loss of the vessel, these representations have also included thanks for the assistance which the Royal Navy provided to the Department of Transport investigation into the circumstances surrounding the tragedy.

RAF Upper Heyford (Noise Tests)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he anticipates the results of the noise tests at Royal Air Force Upper Heyford being published.

Mr. Butler: My noble Friend, the Under Secretary of State for the Armed Forces, will be writing to the hon. Member shortly about this matter.

Nuclear Arsenal

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the steps taken towards dismantling the British nuclear arsenal.

Mr. Stanley: No such steps have been taken. We remain firmly committed to the maintenance of effective deterrence forces, including nuclear forces, as the basis of British defence policy. However, Her Majesty's Government have played a constructive part in the discussions which led to the NATO decision to withdraw 1,400 warheads over the next few years taken at Montebello in 1983, and in trying to achieve progress towards balanced, effective and verifiable arms control agreements.

Josef Mengele and Klaus Barbie

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence why Government files on Josef Mengele and Klaus Barbie have not yet been released.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Defence Establishments

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all Royal Navy, Royal Marines and Fleet Air Arm establishments and state the number of civilian and service personnel at each on 1 April.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Home Service Force

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current total strength of the home service force.

Mr. Stanley: The total strength of the home service force as at 31 May was 1,696.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many and which units of the home service force are so far at full strength; how many and which are not at full strength, and by how much in percentage and absolute terms;

(2) if he will list the location of current units of the home service force and their parent units;

(3) if he will list the units of the home service force which have been formed to date.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the planned locations of units of the home service force and their parent units which are yet to be formed.

Mr. Stanley: The planned locations of units of the home service force which are yet to be formed, and which are part of the plans to expand the home service force to a strength of almost 5,000 announced to Parliament in July last year, together with the names and locations of their respective sponsor units are as set out in the table. The companies to be formed in 1990 are being formed then because they are connected with units being formed as part of the TA phase 2 expansion.

Location of home service force unit	Sponsor unit	Location of sponsor unit	Planned formation date
Oxford	5th (Volunteer) Battalion The Royal Green Jackets	Oxford	1990
Lincoln's Inn	71 Signal Regiments (Volunteers)	Lincoln's Inn	1987
Mayfair	4th (Volunteer) Battalion The Royal Green Jackets	Mayfair	1990
Plymouth	3rd Battalion The Devon and Cornwall Rifle Volunteers	Plymouth	1990
Runcorn	3rd (Volunteer) Battalion The Cheshire Regiment	Northwich	1990

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many men of the home service force will be available for exercise Brave Defender in September.

Mr. Stanley: Our current estimate is that between 2,000 and 3,000 home service force personnel will be eligible to take part, but detailed figures will not be available significantly in advance of the exercise.

Territorial Army Ranges

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions have been given by his Department in respect of pistol and rifle clubs' use of Territorial Army ranges.

Mr. Butler: My Department has issued instructions to TAVR associations concerning the licence arrangements and the safety procedures under which approved civilian rifle and pistol clubs use Territorial Army ranges. Instructions have also been issued to TAVR associations about the charges to be recovered from the clubs for such use.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether exercise Brave Defender integrates United States and British plans for the ground defence of vital installations in Britain.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 17 July.

55. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States of America and British plans for the ground defence of vital installations in the United Kingdom have been integrated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Plans for the ground defence of United States vital installations in the United Kingdom are integrated into our overall home defence plans. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 21 March at columns 585-6 exercise Brave Defender will test our revised home defence plans and procedures and some United States forces will participate in the exercise.

Royal Ulster Constabulary (Portadown)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for defence whether any units of the Ulster Defence Regiment were deployed for use in support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Portadown and the surrounding area on the weekend of 12 to 14 July.

Mr. Butler: No Ulster Defence Regiment units were deployed in the vicinity of the marchers in Portadown over the weekend of 12 to 14 July. Elements of the regiment were, however, engaged on normal operational tasks in the surrounding area in support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many full and part-time members of the Ulster Defence Regiment were arrested by the Royal Ulster Constabulary following incidents at Portadown over the weekend of 12 to 14 July.

Mr. Butler: Three Ulster Defence Regiment soldiers (two full time and one part time) were arrested by the Royal Ulster Constabulary following incidents at Portadown over the weekend of 12 to 14 July. They were arrested in connection with acts committed whilst off duty. All three have tendered their resignations.

Royal Army Medical Corps

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will ensure that in future Royal Army Medical Corps display teams do not put artificial wounds made of wax and dye on members of the general public and that such activities are confined in future to service men.

Mr. Butler: No. The application of simulated wounds to volunteer members of the general public is a major attraction of Royal Army Medical Corps displays and provides realistic practice for members of the corps.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is normal practice for Royal Army Medical Corps display teams visiting fairgrounds and open days to put realistic artificial bullet wounds on the arms of children under the age of 10 years.

Mr. Butler: Simulated wounds are only applied to children under the age of 10 years with the express and personal approval of an accompanying parent or adult.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether men of the Royal Army Medical Corps display team sought to obtain the permission of parents before placing realistic artificial bullet wounds on the arms of children at St. George's park, Wandsworth, on 13 and 14 July.

Mr. Butler: Royal Army Medical Corps recruiting and display teams are instructed to obtain the permission of an accompanying parent or adult before applying simulated wounds to children, and I am advised that these instructions were observed on the occasion referred to by the hon. Member.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has received any complaints about the Royal Army Medical Corps display teams.

Mr. Butler: No.

Royal Auxiliary Air Force

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make it his policy to restore a flying role to the Royal Auxiliary Air Force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The reintroduction of a flying role for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force is still under consideration, subject to the availability of resources. However, I am pleased to announce a trial scheme to assess the feasibility and cost-effectiveness of recruiting RAF volunteer reservists to serve as aircrew in regular RAF squadrons. The trial, which will start next April and last for two years, will offer voluntary reservists the opportunity to fill certain rear-crew positions in the Nimrod maritime reconnaissance force and to provide a complete VC10 transport crew. Eleven volunteer reservists will be recruited for the trial, including two pilots. The cost will amount to some £350,000 over the two year period.

W-82 Shell

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recommendations have been made to NATO Ministers by General Rogers concerning the W-82 shell.

Mr. Stanley: As I said to the hon. Member in my reply to him of 20 May, vol. 79, column 370, the details of SACEUR's report are classified.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received to date concerning the W-82 shell.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has received no letters from members of the public relating exclusively to the issue of the W-82 shell, although several letters from Members of Parliament and members of the public have referred to the question of the modernisation of NATO's nuclear forces in Europe.

E-3A AWACS Aircraft

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether any consideration has yet been given to the possible leasing or buying of E-3A AWACS aircraft;

(2) what consideration he is giving to fitting the airborne early warning Nimrod mission system avionics into an alternative airframe.

Mr. Butler: I am not at present considering these options.

Nimrod (Airborne Early Warning)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will estimate the total cost required to get the mission system avionics for AEW Nimrod to an acceptable level of operation;

(2) if he will estimate the total cost of airborne early warning Nimrod by the time of its planned deployment;

(3) if he will make a statement on the future of the Nimrod early warning system.

Mr. Butler: I have little to add to the replies I gave the hon. Member on 24 May (Vol. 79, c. 601-602). A technical study of various options has been completed and is now being evaluated.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the cost to date of the airborne early warning Nimrod programme.

Mr. Butler: By the end of June this year some £831 million (at current prices) had been spent or committed on the Nimrod AEW project.

Fraser Gunnery Range, Eastney

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress towards the release of land at the Fraser gun ranges at Eastney, Portsmouth.

Mr. Butler: The use of land at Fraser gunnery range is under review in the light of changing service requirements.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the next meeting of European Ministers is to be held to discuss the future of the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: No decision has yet been taken.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the amounts claimed and number of municipal tenant claimants for housing benefit for each local authority in England and Wales in each year since 1982.

Mr. Whitney: We do not collect information in precisely the form requested but separately for rent rebates, rent allowances and rate rebates. As the tables containing this information are rather lengthy I have sent them direct to my hon. Friend and placed a copy in the Library.

Distinction Awards

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider extending distinction awards to include nurses who have made an outstanding contribution to health care.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Distinction awards are made only to consultants and community physicians in the National Health Service. We have no plans to extend this to other groups in the National Health Service.

Whooping Cough Vaccine

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the new whooping cough vaccine produced at Porton Down to go on to the market; and what tests, and on whom, will be performed beforehand.

Mr. John Patten: The vaccine is currently undergoing laboratory tests at the National Institute for Biological Standards and Control. Clinical trials will then be carried out initially on adults and, if satisfactory, on children. It is not possible to say at this stage when the new vaccine will be marketed.

National Insurance

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the proposed new national insurance contributions in each of the following circumstances: (a) a single person earning £35 and £36, (b) a single person earning £54 and £56 and (c) a single person earning £89 and £91.

Mr. Whitney: Under the arrangements proposed to come into effect on 6 October 1985 the information requested is as follows:

Earnings £	*National Insurance Contributions £
35	Nil
36	1·80
54	2·70
56	3·92
89	6·23
91	8·19

*Assumes a person is not in contracted-out employment.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the proposed new national insurance contributions in each of the following circumstances: (a) single wage married couple, husband earns £170, (b) a two wage married couple, when husband earns £85 and wife earns £85, (c) a two wage married couple, husband earns £100 and wife earns £70 and (d) a two wage married couple, husband earns £130 and wife earns £50.

Mr. Whitney: Under the arrangements proposed to come into effect on 6 October 1985 the information requested is as follows:

	National Insurance Contribution £
(a) single wage married couple
husband earns £170	15·30
(b) two wage married couple
husband earns £85	5·95
wife earns £85	5·95
	11·90
(c) two wage married couple
husband earns £100	9·00
wife earns £70	4·90
	13·90
(d) two wage married couple
husband earns £130	11·70
wife earns £50	2·50
	14·20

Note: Not contracted-out employment is assumed in each case. Liability for National Insurance contributions is not affected by sex or marital status except where a married woman has exercised the option to forgo certain benefits in return for reduced contributions. This option is no longer available to new applicants and has not been assumed in any of these examples.

EC (Social Insurance Contributions)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which other member states of the European Community operate the equivalent of the lower earnings limit for social insurance contributions; and which charge contributions on the first £ equivalent of earnings.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the Member States of the European Communities, Portugal and Spain, (Position at 1 January 1984)", a copy of which is in the Library. That publication contains such information as is available on the financing of social insurance schemes in the member states of the Community, including the basis of employers' and employees' liability for contributions.

Repatriation Scheme

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of individuals aided by his Department's repatriation scheme in 1982, 1983 and 1984 and the expenditure incurred in each of those years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no departmental repatriation scheme as such, but I assume my hon. Friend is asking about patients repatriated to their country of origin at public expense. This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mentally Handicapped People (Treatment and Therapy)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average number of hours a year that residents of mental handicap hospitals receive treatment or therapy from (a) doctors, (b) physiotherapists, (c) occupational therapists and (d) psychologists; and how this compares with Government guidelines.

Mr. John Patten: These figures are not collected centrally. Residents of mental handicap hospitals should receive treatment or therapy according to their individual ranges of need, so generally applicable guidelines are not appropriate.

Student Nurses

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the drop-out rate for student nurses during each of the last five years; and what is being done to encourage and enable more student nurses to complete their courses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of trainee nurses discontinuing training in each of the past five years and their proportion to the average number in training during the year is given in the table:

England and Wales

Year ending 31 March	*Numbers discontinuing training	Percentage
1980	6,871	8·8
1981	5,921	7·7
1982	5,344	6·8
1983	6,446	8·2
1984	4,770	6·7

* Total numbers of student and pupil nurses at the various stages of training discontinuing in the year. The figures are not strictly comparable due to a change in the method of collection and processing in 1983.

The overall reduction in the drop-out rate between 1980 and 1984 is thought to be due to a number of factors including the greater selectivity for entry to nurse training schools and our national publicity campaign whose prime object is to educate the public about the true nature of the nurse's role.

The statutory bodies responsible for nurse training are currently considering the future pattern of training. The English National Board has already published proposals for consultation. Improved training arrangements should help to reduce wastage rates.

We recently accepted the recommendation of the Review Body that the pay of recently qualified staff nurses should be specially enhanced. This should further encourage student nurses to complete their training and continue in National Health Service employment.

Home Responsibilities Protection

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to extend the home responsibilities protection to those who have worked less than 20 years on a pro-rata basis.

Mr. Whitney: Home responsibilities protection (HRP) reduces the number of qualifying years (years in which national insurance contributions are paid or credited) needed for a basic retirement pension at the full rate. HRP cannot reduce the number of qualifying years required to less than 20. With the maximum number of years of HRP a full basic pension could be earned from 20 qualifying years. With maximum HRP and contributions paid or credited for less than 20 years a reduced rate basic pension will be payable. For example, a woman requiring 39 qualifying years for a full rate pension who had 19 or more years of HRP would also need another 20 qualifying years for a full pension. Ten qualifying years (i.e. half the number required) plus 19 years HRP would give pension at 50 per cent. of the standard basic rate. Five qualifying years would give pension at 25 per cent. of the standard rate. No pension is payable where the qualifying years amount to less than 25 per cent. of the required number of years. We have no present plans to change these arrangements.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will ensure that no treatment to kidney patients on dialysis or for kidney transplants are denied medication on the grounds of cost; if he will indicate the steps he has taken to reduce the cost of proprietary drugs; if he will give the names of the drugs concerned; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he is considering additional action, apart from the current campaign, to increase the number of kidney donors; if he will indicate the current supply of kidney organs and the possible expansion of the supply of such organs; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what is the number of kidney patients awaiting transplants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent developments have taken place concerning the treatment of kidney patients by continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis; if he will indicate the numbers now receiving such treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Improvements are being made all the time in the provision of continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis (CAPD) which make the procedure easier for patients to administer and which reduce the risk of complications. According to information supplied by the European Dialysis and Transplantation Association, 1,844 renal patients were receiving CAPD treatment in the United Kingdom on 31 December 1984 compared to 1,136 on 31 December 1982. CAPD represents a valuable addition to the range of treatment options available for patients suffering end stage renal failure.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in the light of the campaign to increase the number of kidney donors, he has any plans to establish more renal units or to expand current units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: It is for health authorities to decide whether additional renal units should be established or existing ones expanded.

St. George's Hospital (Sale)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the former St. George's hospital, Hyde Park Corner, was put on the open market before sale to Grosvenor Estate and L.I.B.; and how many offers were considered before sale.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: When the hospital closed in 1980 the Grosvenor Estate exercised its right of pre-emption to acquire the southern part of the site. There is no right of pre-emption on the northern part of the site but when we came to consider its disposal it seemed sensible, because the listed Wilkins building straddles both parts of the site, to negotiate a sale with the Grosvenor Estate. The site has therefore never been put on the open market.

Second European Poverty Programme

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the organisations, their projects and the financial amounts involved whose applications his Department have submitted to the European Economic Community Commission under the provisions of the second European poverty programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The United Kingdom Government submitted 245 applications for financial assistance to the European Commission under the Second European Community Programme to Combat Poverty. The organisations are listed. The projects relate to the themes for the programme as follows:

	Number
Long term unemployed people	26
Young unemployed people	31
Elderly	25
Single parent families	19
Refugees	13
Second generation immigrants	42
Multiple client groups including rural projects	93

The funds sought from the Commission by each project vary between £25,000 and £200,000 in most cases. It would be disproportionately costly to extract and set out the title and exact amount sought for each project individually.

Private Homes for the Elderly

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many private homes for the elderly have (a) been refused registration and (b) had their registration cancelled; and how many of these homes have appealed to the registered homes appeal tribunal in the first six months of 1985.

Mr. John Patten: Information generally about registrations refused is not held centrally. Available information about cancellations and appeals to tribunals against cancellation is listed. The age of the residents in all these homes is not necessarily known.

	Residential care homes	Nursing homes
Cancellations that have taken effect	1	—
Appeals	*8	3

* Five are known to be mainly for elderly people

Titralac

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate will receive a detailed answer to his letter of 6 June to his noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on the question of a tablet called Titralac.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My noble Friend replied to my hon. Friend yesterday.

Small Grants Scheme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the percentage of applications to his Department's small grants scheme which are successful; what are, by broad categories, the reasons for refusal of these applications refused; and if he will give the percentage of the total budget which was taken up for 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. John Patten: The Department's small grants committee considered 383 applications during 1980-84, of these 50 (13 per cent.) were judged by the committee to be of adequate scientific merit and were funded. Details are published in the Department's annual handbook of research and development. Applications which do not meet appropriate scientific standards are rejected. Finance for the small grants scheme is subsumed within the health and personal social services research and development budget managed by the chief scientist. There is no separate cash limit for the scheme and all proposals, deemed by the committee to be acceptable on scientific grounds in the period referred to, have been funded.

Soho Road Office, Birmingham

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his local office in Soho road, Birmingham, has placed restrictions on the suppliers of cookers to recipients of single payments.

Mr. Whitney: In order to ensure that second-hand cookers sold to claimants are properly reconditioned, the Birmingham local offices now ask suppliers to confirm that this is the case when they give claimants estimates for these appliances. No other restrictions apply.

Property and Works Functions

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will announce the results of his examination of the operation of the property and works functions within his Department and within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have today issued a health circular to all health authorities on the future management of property and works in the National Health Service. I have placed copies in the Library. We have decided that there have been too many tiers of management with overlapping responsibilities for these matters within the service. The NHS capital programme will be better managed and delays in hospital building reduced by the introduction of clear definitions of responsibility between our Department, regional health authorities and district health authorities. We will be giving district health authorities greater discretion and a wider choice of sources of advice and expertise in their management of their own capital projects. We also need to continue to strengthen the ability of authorities to improve their management of property and the NHS estate. Our Department's role will in future be restricted to that of determining strategic policies and setting key objectives for the National Health Service, monitoring compliance with these and supporting the National Health Service by the production of cost effective guidance in selected key areas. We will retain a number of high quality staff to carry out this role but the total number of staff employed on works and property within our Department will be sharply reduced.

Design and other consultancy services maintained by regional health authorities will be the subject of rigorous review and will be made more streamlined and efficient. Districts will be able to test the efficiency and responsiveness of any RHA services against those available from outside consultants. We will continue to insist that all Authorities should regard the rationalisation of the NHS estate and further improvement of the National Health Service's recent good record on building value for money major capital projects to cost and to time as high priorities.

Infant Life Preservation Act 1929

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received the views of the medical profession about the case for amending the Infant Life Preservation Act 1929; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The chief medical officer has recently received a document on fetal viability and clinical practice which has been prepared by a working party set up by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists and including representatives of other medical bodies and the Royal College of Midwives. We understand that the report represents the unanimous views of the professional bodies. I am grateful to them for letting us have their considered opinion that the reference to 28 weeks gestational age in the 1929 Act is now out of date in view of advances in medical techniques.

We will be financing the publication of the report and we will arrange for its distribution to nursing homes approved under the Abortion Act and within the National Health Service as soon as possible. I am now considering the report urgently with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I have also asked our officers to convene a meeting with the proprietors of approved nursing homes which at the moment undertake late abortions to discuss the report. I will make a further statement as soon as possible.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the average time taken by his Department to provide a substantive answer to letters from right hon. and hon. Members during the 12 months period to the latest available date.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to his reply, 15 July 1985, c. 56]: A figure is not available in the form requested. On the information that is available the average time taken was a little over a month. However, during the last 12 months there has been an exceptionally large volume of correspondence which means that Ministers are now replying to about 30,000 letters a year from right hon. and hon. Members.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Rail Wagons

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list by volume, price and source the number of overseas contracts carried out in Britain for rail wagons for which his Department has given financial assistance.

Mr. Rifkind: The following railway projects have been supported by aid since 1980:

The Overseas Development Administration does not maintain statistics relating to the volume, price and source of individual contracts let under aid financed projects.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the projects to encourage sustainable forestry in over 20 countries which are aided by the Commonwealth Development Corporation and Overseas Development Administration.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Factory Farming

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to bring British factory farming legislation into line with the European convention.

Mrs. Fenner: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body) on 27 June at column 464.

Milk Quota

Mr. Alex Carlile: asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to enable tenants to acquire an interest in milk quota; and whether he has any plans to permit tenants to lease to others unused quota belonging to their holdings.

Mr. Jopling: I am conscious of the interests of both tenants and landlords in milk quotas. I am considering how these interests can best be recognised in the context of possible arrangements for allowing quota to be transferred separately from land.

WALES

Health Authorities

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those health authorities in Wales where the statutory National Health Service auditor has found systems weaknesses in relation to the payment of private patient charges in 1984; and if he will place the auditor's reports in the Library.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: During the audit investigation into private medical practice and other matters undertaken between April 1984 and February 1985, the National Health Service Statutory auditor for Wales identified systems weaknesses in relation to the payment of charges for private patient treatment in all 9 health authorities in Wales.

Several of the audit reports completed as part of this investigation have been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. Publication of these and other reports cannot be considered at present as it might be prejudicial to any subsequent investigations. Matters referred to in one of the audit reports are already the subject of police investigation. We would not in any event consider the question of publication of these audit reports until all the authorities' responses had been received and considered by the Department.

"Lifting the Burden"

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" and its potential impact upon Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The White Paper "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571) is the Government's response to the report "Burdens on Business" published earlier this year. That report showed that Government requirements impose real costs on business which can inhibit development and growth. While the White Paper recognises the important role that statutory requirements and regulations have in the protection of workers, consumers and the general public unnecessary constraints act as a brake on enterprise and the creation of jobs and wealth. The removal of such constraints will allow firms, and especially small firms, to release scarce resources to help the development and expansion of their business with consequent benefits to the economies of both Wales and the United Kingdom.

Welsh Language (Expenditure)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the level of expenditure by his Department on the Welsh language in the financial year 1984-85; and what percentage increase this represents on the 1983-84 figure.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The level of expenditure by our Department on the Welsh language in 1984-85 was £2,535,231 which represents a reduction of 4·9 per cent. over expenditure in 1983-84 due to decreasing costs associated with the Welsh element in bilingual roadsigns on motorways and trunk roads.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give a breakdown of his Department's expenditure on the Welsh language in 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Tan-Yr-Unts (Road Scheme)

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action has been taken since the recent nearly fatal accidents on the Tan-Yr-Unts bend to implement one of the two road schemes being examined after the last fatal accident in 1983.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I expect to reach a conclusion very soon on what might be the most appropriate long-term solution to the problem posed by the bend. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as I have done so.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make available extra cash to the Wales area health authorities in order that they might fund the nurses' pay award; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. The additional costs of the pay award to nurses this year, and to other staff subject to review bodies recommendations over and above the cash increases which we have made available to health authorities is less than £1 million or 0·1 per cent. of their revenue allocations. We have however recently provided them with additional capital funds which can be used for developing revenue saving schemes and which with further improvements in efficiency should help to relieve the pressures on their resources.

Inmos

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the employment prospects for the Inmos factory, Newport; what is the reason for not building stage II of the Inmos factory; how many current Inmos workers in Newport are on short-time; how many are drawing lower wages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The questions raised are essentially matters for the company which has issued a press release explaining that the 200 redundancies at Newport and the indefinite postponement of the new assembly operation planned to begin this year are part of a programme to cut costs in the currently depressed semi-conductor market. The company has also said that to exploit its design skills and advanced manufacturing facilities and to allow it to compete in world markets it will be giving priority to the introduction of new high value products, such as the transputer, and gradually phasing out the direct manufacture of its dynamic RAM products.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, for each of the years 1973 to 1984, he will provide such information as is available as to the number of hospital beds in each Welsh health authority region which were (a) closed as a result of complete hospital closure, (b) closed in hospitals which were not completely closed, (c) provided as a result of new hospital openings and (d) provided as a result of additions to existing hospitals.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards [pursuant to his reply, 12 July 1985, c. 550]: The information requested is provided in the tables, together with the number of inpatients treated in each year. The tables demonstrate the Government's policy of transferring patients from long stay hospitals to more appropriate forms of care, and show its continuing commitment to providing more care in the acute sector, where bed numbers have increased by well over 1,000 since 1979 when the Government took office and where the number of patients treated has risen steadily.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Street Collections (Prosecutions)

59. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will review the policy of prosecuting people for carrying out street collections in London during the period March 1984 to March 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. This is a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Dr. Mark Patterson

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Dr. Mark Patterson, an inmate of Ford open prison, had a hernia operation in Chichester hospital.

Mr. Meller: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 16 July at column 74.

Remanded Persons

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of people held on remand in the period 1983 to the latest available date were not finally convicted of an offence;

(2) what proportion of people held on remand over six months in the period 1983 to the latest available date, were found not guilty of an alleged offence.

Mr. Meller: The latest readily available information is given in the following table:

Persons received into Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on initial remand in custody in 1983: by length of time between initial remand in custody and outcome of proceedings and outcome

Percentage

Outcome of proceedings	*Length of time between initial remand in custody and outcome of proceedings			Total
	Up to six months	Over six months	Not recorded
Found not guilty or not proceeded against	3	8	—	3
Sentenced	94	88	12	87
Not recorded	3	4	88	9
Total	100	100	100	100

* Including any time which may have been spent on bail after the initial remand in custody.

Repatriation Scheme

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the number of applications (families), (b) the number of persons assisted (individuals) and (c) the expenditure incurred under Her Majesty's Government's repatriation scheme based on section 29 of the Immigration Act 1971, for the years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The information is as follows:

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Applications (families)	459	324	185	112
Persons assisted (individuals)	291	152	144	81
Expenditure	£169,206	£162,203	£169,259	*£118,982

* This is a provisional figure; the audited account is not yet available.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many miners are currently in prison after convictions for offences arising out of the recent strike; and how many are serving sentences of up to one year, one to three years and over three years, respectively.

Mr. Maller: The information requested is not available.

Terrorism

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Billericay on 12 July, if he will list in the Official Report those known terrorist groups about which information is made available to those who need to know it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: It would not be in the interests of security to publish such a list.

Detained Persons

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained overnight during 1984 in (a) Harmondsworth detention centre and (b) the Queen's building, Heathrow.

Mr. Waddington: At Harmondsworth, 3,114. The same information for Queen's building is not available but in 1984 a total of 4,879 persons were detained there for some period, not necessarily overnight.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained overnight under Immigration Act powers upon entry to the United Kingdom during 1984 by nationality.

Mr. Waddington: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a similar question from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on 29 April 1985 at columns 21-24.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average daily population of those detained in prison department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1984.

Mr. Maller: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 26 March at column 133.

Refugees and Asylum

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Government plan to publish their response to the Home Affairs Committee's report on refugees and asylum.

Mr. Waddington: Progress has been made in preparing a response to the Committee's report but some of its recommendations, which raise important issues, require further consideration, and I regret that I am not yet in a position to give a date for publication.

Ms. Boi Thi Minh

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will make a decision on the application for family re-unification from Ms. Boi Thi Minh.

Mr. Waddington: The case will be further considered in the light of the Government's response to the Home Affairs Committee's report on refugees and asylum, which recommended the relaxation of family reunion criteria in respect of Vietnamese refugees in camps in countries of temporary asylum.

Illegal Entrants

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people treated as illegal entrants during 1984 were granted temporary admission; and how many of these absconded.

Mr. Waddington: Figures relating to illegal entrants detected during 1984 and the way in which they were dealt with are given in table 19 of the "Control of Immigration: Statistics 1984" (Cmnd. 9544). Of the illegal entrants temporarily released during 1984 17 absconded.

Sexual Offences Act 1985

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to take steps to monitor the operation of the Sexual Offences Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maller: The Home Office is setting up arrangements to obtain the usual statistics of court proceedings (including the number of acquittals) in respect of offences under sections 1 and 2 of the Sexual Offences Act 1985. In addition, the Director of Public Prosecutions is making arrangements to record, in due course, the number of cases in which proceedings are instituted under section 1 of the Act but are not taken forward by the Crown prosecution service.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to issue a departmental circular for the guidance of chief constables with regard to the implementation of the Sexual Offences Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maller: Arrangements are in hand to issue an explanatory circular before the Act comes into force on 16 September.

Pucklechurch Remand Centre

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors contributed to the delay between the inspection of Pucklechurch remand centre by Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons in August 1982 and the publication of the inspectorate's report in June 1985.

Mr. Maller: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 8 July at column 316. I regret that that answer gave the impression that only 5 reports were received in 1982 and 1983 together. In fact 5 reports were received in 1983 (14 having been received in 1982).

Prisoners (Wages)

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the level of wages paid to prisoners was last reviewed; and when the next review will take place.

Mr. Maller: The rates of earnings paid to prisoners are reviewed annually and revised rates are brought into operation with effect from the first Monday in October of each year. The revised rates following the review undertaken in 1984 came into effect on 1 October 1984 and the revised rates resulting from the review currently being undertaken are expected to be operative from 7 October 1985.

Stonehenge (Incident)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned as to whether property confiscated from people taken to police stations during the operation at Stonehenge on 1 June and not required for evidence has been returned.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Chief Constable of Wiltshire informs me that all such property has been returned except that required in connection with criminal proceedings and certain items which have remained unclaimed.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned as to whether the police have disposed of photographs and fingerprints of those arrested and subsequently released without charge following the incident at Stonehenge on 1 June.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Chief Constable of Wiltshire has informed me that when police inquiries have been completed the fingerprints and photographs of any person in respect of whom no charges are to be brought will be destroyed.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers, and from which police forces, were deployed during the operation at Stonehenge on 1 June.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Chief Constable of Wiltshire that the number of police officers available to him on 1 June at Chilcletton were as follows:

Police force	Number of officers
Hampshire	349
Avon and Somerset	234
Thames Valley	147
Wiltshire	81
Gloucestershire	49
Dorset	46
Total	780

An additional 250-300 Wiltshire officers were on duty elsewhere within the force area, including about 80 at Stonehenge monument itself and Ministry of Defence police were also on duty on Ministry of Defence land nearby.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned about whether all police officers from all forces present during the operation at Stonehenge on 1 June were wearing visible identity numbers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Chief Constable of Wiltshire is aware of reports that some of the officers under his command on 1 June wearing flameproof overalls did not display identification numbers. Initial issues of this clothing did not provide for numbers to be shown but it is the chief constable's intention that officers in his force display numbers and to modify existing uniforms where necessary in line with the policy of the Association of Chief Police Officers, endorsed by the Department, to which I referred in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 30 October 1984 at column 890.

Prisoners' Medical Treatment

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department concerning allowing prisoners in prisons in England and Wales to go to outside private hospitals for medicinal treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Meller: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Mrs. Mabel Achinilbu

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will receive a small deputation headed by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside before he makes a decision on the proposed deportation of Mrs. Mabel Achinilbu;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the organisations and individuals who have made representations to him opposing the proposed deportation of Mrs. Mabel Achinilbu; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Representations on behalf of Mrs. Achinilbu have been received from 11 hon. Members and one Member of the European Parliament. A number of individuals and organisations have also made representations, and a petition with 4,000-5,000 signatures has been presented to the immigration service office in Liverpool.

Arrangements are being made for Mrs. Achinilbu to be re-interviewed by the immigration service in Liverpool. Her case will then be carefully reviewed in the light of what is learnt during that interview, and representations on her behalf from hon. Members and others.

I can assure the hon. Member that he will be given the opportunity of a meeting before any decision to remove Mrs. Achinilbu is taken.

West Midlands Police

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to how many police officers there are on the West Midlands police constabulary and how many of them are formally allocated to patrol duties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 June 1985 there were 6,530 police officers in the West Midlands police; 3,281 were allocated to patrol duties on that day.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Midlands police as to how many policewomen have received a promotion in the West Midlands police constabulary in each year since 1979, and how many have been employed on administrative duties within the West Midlands police constabulary during the same period.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of policewomen who were promoted in the West Midlands police during the last six years is as follows:

	Number
1979	6
1980	1
1981	2
1982	5
1983	3
1984	9

Figures of the numbers of officers employed on administrative duties in the force during this period could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Drug Trafficking

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide additional resources to enable the plan submitted by the Association of Chief Police Officers for tackling the problem of drug trafficking to be implemented.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on 18 July. Police authority expenditure on recruiting the additional officers will attract police grant in the usual way; to mark the importance the Government attach to this initiative it is ready to disregard their share of this extra expenditure for grant penalty purposes.

Prison Population

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total prison population on 12 July.

Mr. Meller: Forty-eight thousand and thirty-seven (excluding 74 prisoners in police cells).

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the certified normal accommodation and what was the population on 12 July at (a) Her Majesty's prison, Birmingham, (b) Her Majesty's prison, Bristol, (c) Her Majesty's prison and remand centre, Cardiff, (d) Her Majesty's prison, Hull, (e) Her Majesty's prison, Leeds, (f) Her Majesty's prison, Lincoln, and (g) Her Majesty's prison, Liverpool.

(2) what is the certified normal accommodation and what was the population on 12 July at (a) Her Majesty's prison, Manchester, (b) Her Majesty's prison, Wandsworth, (c) Her Majesty's prison, Winchester, (d) Her Majesty's prison, Wormwood Scrubs and (e) Her Majesty's prison, Durham.

Mr. Meller: The information requested is as follows:

Establishment	Certified normal accommodation	Population
Birmingham	570	1,114
Bristol	561	648
Cardiff*	339	541
Hull	318	276
Leeds	624	1,337
Lincoln	359	633
Liverpool	838	1,468
Manchester*	1,034	1,711
Wandsworth	1,258	1,540
Winchester*	490	578
Wormwood Scrubs	1,011	1,300
Durham†	708	1,283

* Includes both prison and remand centre
† Includes both males and females

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps, in addition to the prison building programme, he is taking to relieve the current level of prison overcrowding and to reduce the prison population.

Mr. Mellor: We are keeping the situation under careful review and ensuring that every effort is being made to get the best use from available accommodation.

Prison Sentences

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether prison sentences are exclusive or inclusive of periods spent in private clinics.

Mr. Mellor: Where it is necessary for a prisoner to receive treatment in a clinic or hospital outside the prison, the period spent there counts towards his sentence.

Prisoners (Private Clinics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what conditions prisoners are permitted to undergo non-urgent operations in private clinics.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Immigration

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state, for each of the years 1970 to 1984 inclusive, the proportion of persons admitted for settlement in the United Kingdom who were so admitted as spouses, children or dependants of persons already settled in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: The total numbers of spouses and children accepted for settlement on arrival, and on removal of time limit, together with totals for all persons so accepted in the years 1973-84 are given in "Control of Immigration: Statistics" (Tables 15 to 17 of the issues for 1983 (Cmnd. 9246) and 1984 (Cmnd. 9544)). The total number of children admitted for settlement in 1970-72 is given in table 12 of the issue for 1980 (Cmnd. 8199).

The other information requested is not readily available.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what authority he includes British citizens within the category of Commonwealth citizens for the purposes of section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Waddington: That of Parliament: I would refer the right hon. Member to section 1 of the British Nationality Act 1948 and section 37 of the British Nationality Act 1981.

Gloucester Place Fire

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take following representations he has received from the coroner who conducted the inquest into the deaths of Mrs. Karim and her two children at 46 Gloucester place, London W1.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a report from Her Majesty's coroner for Westminster following the inquest into the fire at 46 Gloucester place, Marylebone, in which a mother and two children died last November; what recommendations to him are contained in Her Majesty's coroner's report; what action he proposes to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has received representations, in the form of a letter from Her Majesty's coroner for inner West London, suggesting changes in the legislative arrangements for securing adequate fire precautions and means of escape in houses in multiple occupation. He is studying these in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who has received similar representations.

Mr. Harold Roberts

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letter of 21 March concerning Harold Roberts from the hon. Member for Stretford.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will be writing shortly.

Miss Hilda Murrell

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken on the letter from the hon. Member for Linlithgow to the Minister of State of last week, making suggestions as to individuals who ought to be interviewed in relation to the murder of Hilda Murrell.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information contained in the hon. Member's letter of 8 July was passed to West Mercia police on 15 July for such action as the chief constable considered appropriate in his continuing investigation into Miss Murrell's death. I understand that the individuals concerned have been interviewed but that no information has been forthcoming to assist West Mercia's inquiry.

Crime Statistics (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the estimates which have been made by the British crime survey during the past five years of offences in the west midlands region related to vandalism, theft from vehicles, burglaries in dwellings, theft of vehicles, bicycle thefts, thefts in dwellings, other housing thefts, assaults, theft from persons/robbery, sexual offences and other personal thefts.

Mr. Mellor: The samples used for the survey are not large enough to allow estimates to be made of the number of offences committed in particular police areas.

Strip Searches (Ports of Entry)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many strip searches there have been of men and women at ports of entry in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: No strip searches have been carried out at ports of entry by Home Office officials in this period.

I am advised by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that HM Customs and Excise keeps no records centrally of strip searches.

Police (Complaints)

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police authorities and the number of officers involved in complaints in each authority; and whether any officer has been involved in more than one complaint in connection with the mining dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The table records, by police area, the number of members of the police force against whom complaints arising from the miners' strike were recorded under s.49 of the Police Act 1964 between 13 March 1984 and 5 March 1985. In addition 273 complaints were made against officers who have not been identified.

The other information sought is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sumrie Clothes plc, Leeds

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Yorkshire as to the progress of police inquiries into allegations by Mr. Patrick Benson, former chief executive of Sumrie Clothes plc, Leeds, regarding the financial relationship between Sumrie Clothes and other companies in which Mr. Michael Hepker has a controlling or major financial interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police for the City of London, whose officers are handling this matter, that preliminary inquiries are continuing and that a report will be submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions in due course.

Prisoners (Tranquillisers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have been prescribed powerful tranquillisers by prison doctors in each year since 1979; what proportion of such prescriptions were Largactil; in which prisons they were prescribed; and how many inmates suffered severe or irreversible illnesses as a result.

Mr. Meller: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Sports Grounds (Safety)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be in a position to designate under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 the stadia of clubs in divisions 3 and 4 of the Football League and clubs in divisions I and II of the Rugby League.

Mr. Brittan: The necessary orders were laid before the House on Friday 19 July to designate 36 Football League stadia and 22 stadia used by Rugby League clubs with effect from 9 August. Their effect will be to require the clubs in all cases to apply for safety certificates from the appropriate local authorities. Until such time as certificates are issued the clubs will be free to use the grounds as they are. However, I imagine that the certificating authorities will wish on this occasion to move quickly to issue certificates, even if initially the certificates are of a provisional character, and to operate so as to limit spectator numbers where necessary in order to minimise the necessity for immediate or expensive building works.

Spain (Extradition Treaty)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he now expects the United Kingdom and Spain will sign an extradition treaty.

Mr. Brittan: A new extradition treaty was signed in London earlier today. I and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs signed for the United Kingdom.

The treaty represents a significant achievement for both Spain and the United Kingdom, and I welcome the co-operation which the Spanish authorities have shown throughout the negotiations. It is clearly wrong that those accused or convicted of serious offences should be able to evade justice merely because of the absence of an extradition arrangement. My officials and the Director of Public Prosecutions (who will represent the Government of Spain in extradition proceedings) will give the Spanish authorities every assistance in making the new treaty work.

The treaty will be presented to Parliament in due course.

ENERGY

Petrol Price

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he had any discussions with the chairmen of oil companies about recent petrol price reductions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have had no such discussions.

Wave Power

Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current projected figure for generating electricity from wave power as generated by the Salter Duck.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department considers that there is a low probability of any design for large scale wave power generation, including the Salter Duck, achieving a cost of energy below 9p/kWh (1984 money values).

Details of the cost assessment are given in ETSU R26, Wave Energy, which is deposited in the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Ian MacGregor (Payments)

Mr. Leighton asked the Prime Minister what have been the total sums paid to Mr. Ian MacGregor since he took up appointments to manage publicly owned industries; and what is the Government's total financial obligation to him.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 30 November 1984 at col. 607.

The amount of the two performance-related payments to be made to Lazard Freres in compensation for the release of Mr. MacGregor to serve as chairman of BSC will be determined and announced in the near future.

Terrorism

Mr. Terlezki asked the Prime Minister if, following recent East-West co-operation on terrorism, she will remind the Soviet Government of the need to eradicate terrorism.

The Prime Minister: The Government have consistently made clear that widespread international co-operation is essential in combatting international terrorism. We believe the Soviet Union has a role to play in this and we will take every suitable opportunity to urge them to join with others in the common fight against terrorism.

Information Technology

Mr. Faulds asked the Prime Minister which Minister has been charged with responsibility for co-ordinating work on information technology policy matters throughout government; and whether there has been any recent change in this matter.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie) is designated as Minister of State for Industry and Information Technology.

Sir Robert Armstrong (Speech)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether she saw in advance the text of the speech by Sir Robert Armstrong to the centenary conference of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy on 18 June; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Sir Robert Armstrong showed me in advance the text of what he proposed to say on that occasion. I indicated he was free to speak as he wished. I made no comments or suggestions for alterations.

European Community (Food Aid)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the failure of the European Economic Community to deliver the pledged total of food aid to the drought stricken nations of North and East Africa; and if she will call for a report from the Commission on this issue.

The Prime Minister: The European Council will not meet again until 2 December. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will continue to monitor closely the rate of deliveries of Community food aid for the rest of the year. He saw for himself last week at Port Assab in Ethiopia that the great bulk of the grain being unloaded was from the European Community. Community food aid will continue to play a very important role in the months to come. However, the ports serving famine affected countries in the Sahel and East Africa are congested with food at present. The priority now is to improve internal distribution; we and other member states of the Community, together with other donors, are making every effort to overcome this problem.

European Community (Cereal Prices)

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister why Her Majesty's Government will not refer to the European Court the matter of the action of the European Economic Community Commission in overruling a national veto on cereal price reduction.

The Prime Minister: It would not be useful to add to the uncertainties over cereals prices.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

52. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a further statement on the famine situation in Ethiopia.

53. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the current state of aid to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: I refer my hon. Friends to my statement earlier today.

Nicaragua

54. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current value of United Kingdom aid to Nicaragua.

Mr. Raison: British bilateral aid to Nicaragua in 1984-85 amounted to about £36,000. We also contribute to humanitarian relief for the region from which Nicaragua benefits.

India

55. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has made for the provision of aid to India during the years 1986 and 1987, respectively.

Mr. Raison: British aid is planned on a financial year basis. In 1985-56 we plan to spend £115 million of bilateral aid, provided that agreement is reached on certain projects which we have approved in principle. In addition, we expect to spend £14 million from the aid and trade provision. Figures are not available for subsequent years.

UNESCO

56. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress to date in the reform of the United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: Largely as a result of our pressure, advances have been made since early 1984 in planning better programmes, reducing politicisation, increasing financial control and finding ways of improving management and the working of the governing bodies. Progress has been quicker in some areas than others. By the end of the year, after the general conference, we should have a clearer picture of whether the organisation will really be healthy enough to reclaim our allegiance.

Caribbean

57. Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for discussions about British aid policy in the Caribbean.

Mr. Raison: In response to a request from the member Governments of the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States, I have offered to meet the Ministers of these countries soon to discuss British bilateral aid to the region.

Overseas Aid

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total figure for the United Kingdom overseas aid budget in 1984-85; and what were the respective disbursements in (a) the Asian sub-continent, (b) African Commonwealth countries and (c) the West Indies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The gross aid programme in 1984-85 was some £1,169 million, made up of the public expenditure allocation for overseas aid (£1,099 million) plus capital repayments (approximately £70 million).

Outturn figures, for bilateral country programmes in the regions named, which are provisional pending finalisation of the Appropriation Account, are as follows:

	£ million
(a) Asian sub-continent	190
(b) African Commonwealth countries	113
(c) Caribbean (including Dependencies)	14

These amounts exclude aid programme funds made available via multilateral aid organisations and European Community institutions.

Falkland Islands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the reasons for the appointment of each of the individual members of the board of the Falkland Islands Development Corporation; and what are the qualifications and business interests of these members.

Mr. Raison: Members of the Falkland Islands Development Corporation are appointed in accordance with section 6 of the ordinance establishing the corporation. The provisions, together with the names and background of current members, are as follows:

(a) a representative of Her Majesty's Government (Mr. M. Crosse, economist);

(b) an elected member of the Executive Council (Councillor R. Binnie);

(c) a person not being a member of the Executive Council who the Civil Commissioner in Council considers represents the interests of farmers in the Falkland Islands (Mr. N. Watson, owner-occupier of Long Island farm);

(d) two persons who the Civil Commissioner in Council considers have had experience in matters relating to trade or industry (Mr. S. Wallace, employee of Cable and Wireless, and Mr. T. Betts, chairman of the General Employees Union and employee of the Falkland Islands Company);

(e) two persons holding public office in the Falkland Islands (Mr. M. Geiger, Attorney-General and Mr. A. Cameron, Falkland Islands Government Representative in London).

The chief executive (Mr. D. Taylor), general manager (Mr. S. Armstrong) and financial secretary (Mr. H. Rowlands) are ex-officio members of the board. Members are required to disclose financial or business interests only if these affect matters being considered by the corporation, in which case they may not take part in any vote thereon at any meeting.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Foreign Language Report

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which schools in the west midlands region contributed to the compilation of information in the report, entitled Foreign Language Performance in Schools, issued recently by his Department.

Mr. Dunn: The report was prepared by the National Foundation for Educational Research as the result of a sample survey conducted for the assessment of performance unit. As with similar surveys in other areas of the curriculum, schools were invited to participate on the understanding that no information would be passed to the Department or the other funding Departments nor made available for general publication which would allow results to be identified as those of a particular school or pupil.

Support Grants

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he will make a statement on the ninth project of the education support grants programme for 1986-87 support for parents of the under-fives with special needs, stating the number of tenders for the materials involved, the successful company, and what alternative proposals to supply the projects were considered and costed; and whether he is satisfied there is no British organisation which could have met the demands of the project;

(2) whether he will list in the Official Report those projects forming the second round of education support grant programmes which involve one specific set of learning materials; together with the country of origin of those learning materials; and whether he will give details of the process by which the materials were selected.

Mr. Dunn: None of the activities constituting the 1986-87 education support grant programme assumes the use of one specific set of learning materials. It is for LEAs, in formulating bids, due to be submitted on 30 September 1985 for expenditure to be supported under the programme, to decide, within the framework of guidelines given in the 1985 education support grant circular, what materials to use. In the case of activity IX, the provision of services to support parents in the teaching of children under five with special educational needs, the multi-professional teams, whose establishment and development it is envisaged grant will support, may wish to design their own materials.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the schools which have ceased to participate in the assisted places scheme, stating the duration of participation in each case.

Mr. Dunn: The information is as follows:

	Duration
Eastbourne college	1 term
Hasmonean High school	2 years
Shrewsbury school	2 years

Mr. Freud: asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he will list in the Official Report the percentage fee increase in each school participating in the assisted places scheme in each year since its introduction; and what are the increases for the next academic year;

(2) whether he will list in the Official Report for the latest year for which figures are available (a) the maximum paid in respect of one school, and (b) the average paid in respect of one school under the assisted places scheme represented by incidental expenses of (i) travel, (ii) uniform, (iii) meals and (iv) all three;

(3) whether he will list in the Official Report for the latest year for which figures are available (a) the maximum paid in respect of one pupil, and (b) the average paid per pupil under the assisted places scheme for the incidental expenses of (i) travel, (ii) uniforms and (iii) school meals and of (i), (ii) and (iii) together;

(4) whether he will list in the Official Report for the latest year for which figures are available the percentage of the average assistance with fees for a pupil under the assisted places scheme represented by the assistance with incidental expenses for travel, meals and uniform;

(5) whether he will list in the Official Report for the latest year for which figures are available the percentage of the average fee income to participating schools in respect of (a) assisted places pupils and (b) all pupils represented by the assistance with incidental expenses for travel, meals and uniform;

(6) whether he will list in the Official Report those organisations who were consulted about the 60 per cent. requirement in relation to children entering the assisted places scheme from the maintained sector; and whether he will give details of the form of the consultative process;

(7) whether he will list in the Official Report those organisations who selection for an assisted place, were choir boys; what proportion of the relevant age group entering the scheme this represents; and what proportion of all assisted places pupils entering the scheme from the private sector this represents;

(8) whether he will list in the Official Report a breakdown by age group of the pupils entering the assisted places scheme who attended a private school at the time of their selection for the scheme; and how many and what proportion of each group attended the same school before and after their entry to the scheme.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Temporary Admission Students

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will arrange for students, permitted to enter the United Kingdom on temporary admission, not to be subject to fees charged to overseas students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1983 (SI 1983/973) as amended in 1984 (SI 1984/1201) already provide for refugees and those who have exceptionally been granted leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom to pay fees as home students. My right hon. Friend has no plans to extend this concession to those who have been given temporary admission to the United Kingdom.

EC (Scientific Studies)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the total number of scientific studies in British universities or polytechnics which have been funded by the European Economic Community in each academic year since 1979-80; if he will give a breakdown of the category of those studies; what proportion of them had previously requested grants from his Department; and what was the total contribution which the European Economic Community made towards the study being undertaken at the university of Birmingham on childhood cancers.

Mr. Brooke: Figures on the total number of scientific studies funded by the European Economic Community are not held by the Department: I understand that it is not the policy of the European Communities Commission to disclose this information.

The European Economic Community, through the radiation protection research programme, has contributed to £87,100 (£40,800 in 1983 and £46,300 in 1984) towards the continuing study of childhood cancers at the university of Birmingham.

Graham Report

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which specific recommendations in the Graham report on teacher training he intends to implement in the field of secondary school education.

Mr. Dunn: The report of the Suffolk education department on teacher appraisal reaches various conclusions which need to be addressed by all the partners in the education service. The authors express the hope that the next stage will be wider practical field trials and, in welcoming the report as an important contribution to the current debate and activity on teacher appraisal, my right hon. Friend reminded the partners that resources remain available for education support grant project to take forward the necessary fieldwork identified in the researchers' report. He said that he very much hoped that the employers and teachers will now see their way to agreeing to get this project, which he hoped would have begun in April, off the ground.

Micro-Electronics

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what factors he is taking into account in his present consideration of proposals to centralise the micro-electronics education programme and to move its administrative headquarters from Newcastle-upon-Tyne to London; what financial support he intends to give the programme during the next two years; and how this compares with the financial backing which his Department has allocated to it during the past two years.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend will make an announcement shortly.

Unemployment Videos

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to compile a series of videos featuring school pupils and firms in regions of high unemployment similar to the one produced by his Department, relating to the north-east of England.

Mr. Dunn: No. Although the video programme "One Week in July" was made in the north-east of England, the principles of co-operation between education and industry which it illustrates apply nationally. The video, which will be widely available in the autumn, is part of the support which the Department is giving to Industry Year 1986.

Allowances

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the proportion of the average secondary school budget represented by average allowances to pupils in respect of travel, meals and uniform.

Mr. Dunn: In 1983-84 the net cost of providing secondary school pupils with transport between home and school represented 2·4 per cent. of the total net expenditure by local education authorities in England on secondary schools. Information on the cost of meals and uniforms for secondary pupils is not collected by the Department.

Further Education (Women)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the projected number of students entering further education for 1985-86 are women.

Mr. Brooke: No separate projections are produced of the numbers entering further education by sex. In November 1984, 50·2 per cent. of all further education enrolments in England were women; a rise from 48·2 per cent. in November 1981.

Incidental Expenses

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has for each local education authority as to (a) the total amount allocated for the incidental expenses of (i) school uniforms, (ii) school travel and (iii) free school meals, (b) the average amount per pupil receiving such help for each of the above categories and (c) the average amount per school in respect of each category; and if he will express the last figure as a percentage of the average capitation income for a school.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) on 14 May 1985 at columns 100-102 for the net cost to each local education authority of providing children with transport between home and school. Information on the other items is not collected by the Department.

Unemployed People

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will detail his proposals for providing education and training for the unemployed who do not qualify for the youth training scheme.

Sir Keith Joseph: Particulars of the REPLAN programme, through which the Department and the Welsh Office are seeking to encourage the development of educational opportunities for unemployed adults, were given on 16 July in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) at columns 93-94.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tropical Forests

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he has taken following the statement by the United Nations conference on Trade and Industry in 1983 on the need to curb the demand for the goods and services that tropical forests supply.

Mr. Channon: The United Kingdom, together with the other members of the European Community, has joined the International Tropical Timber Agreement (ITTA) which entered into force on 1 April 1985 and intends to play an active part in its operations.

One of the objectives of the ITTA is to encourage the development of policies aimed at sustainable utilisation and conservation of tropical forests.

Pharmaceuticals (Patent Law)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is his intention to seek to bring United Kingdom patent law for pharmaceuticals into line with the provisions of the European Patent Convention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: In the few areas where the European Patent Convention and United Kingdom patent law make special provision for pharmaceuticals, they are in line. I do not consider that any action is required.

Overseas Ministerial Visits

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what criteria are adopted in inviting companies to participate in ministerial visits overseas; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of such opportunities.

Mr. Channon: Company representatives are invited to accompany Ministers on overseas visits whenever this will enhance United Kingdom export prospects. In issuing invitations we take into account such factors as the nature of the opportunities, the interest and capability of companies and, in certain instances, the stage of contract negotiations reached. There is usually a natural limit to the size of the team and we spread invitations as fairly as possible. Companies indicate that they find participation valuable.

Textile and Clothing (Imports)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list total United Kingdom textile and clothing imports from Taiwan in 1984 and compare it with Taiwan textile and clothing imports from the United Kingdom in the same year;

(2) what was the total of United Kingdom textile and clothing imports from Brazil in 1984; and how this compares with Brazilian textile and clothing imports from the United Kingdom in the same year;

(3) if he will list total United Kingdom textile and clothing imports from Korea in 1984, and total Korean textile and clothing imports from the United Kingdom in the same year.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

Value £ million

	United Kingdom imports (cif)	United Kingdom exports (fob)
Taiwan	68·3	3·5
Brazil	16·3	1·6
South Korea	152·5	6·2

Source:

Data corresponding to SITC/R2 Divisions 65 and 84 (less Group 848), Groups 266 and 267 and Sub-group 268·7 (part).

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is the United Kingdom tariff on garment imports from Brazil; and how this compares with the Brazilian tariff on garment imports from the United Kingdom;

(2) what is the total United Kingdom tariff on fabric imports from Brazil; and how this compares with the Brazilian tariff on fabric imports from the United Kingdom;

(3) what is the United Kingdom tariff on fabric imports from Taiwan; and how this compares with the Taiwan tariff on fabric imports from the United Kingdom;

(4) what is the United Kingdom tariff on garment imports from Taiwan; and how this compares with the Taiwan tariff on garment imports from the United Kingdom;

(5) if he will list the United Kingdom tariff on garment imports from Korea, and the current Korean tariff on garment imports from the United Kingdom;

(6) what is the current United Kingdom tariff on fabric imports from Korea, and the similar Korean tariff on fabric imports from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Channon: The broad ranges of these tariffs are:

	United Kingdom per cent.	Brazil per cent.	Taiwan, per cent.	Korea per cent.
Fabrics	3·5 to 17·3	20 to 105	1·25* to 75	20 to 40
Garments	5·4 to 15·3	45 to 105	1·25* to 75	20 to 40

* Exceptional.

but these ranges conceal wide variations, and some United Kingdom tariffs on imports from Brazil and Korea are, within certain limits for sensitive products, waived under the European Communities' generalised scheme of preference.

Full information is available in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise tariff and extracts from the tariff schedules of Brazil, Taiwan and the Republic of Korea, all of which are in the Library.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and industry to what extent exports from the United Kingdom to Brazil of garments, fabrics, textile and clothing are limited by Government ban; and how this compares with the importation of these products from Brazil.

Mr. Channon: Brazil has suspended the issue of import licences for garments, fabrics, textiles and clothing, under the following CCCN chapter headings:

50 (Silk and silk waste)
53 (Wool and other animal hair)
55 (Cotton)
58 (Carpets, mats, matting and tapestries, pile and chenille fabrics, trimmings, tulle and other net fabrics, lace and embroidery)
60 (Knitted and crocheted goods)
61 (Articles of apparel or clothing, accessories of textile fabric other than knitted and crocheted goods)
62 (Other made up textile materials)
63 (Old clothing and other textile articles and rags)

The United Kingdom does not operate any ban on Brazilian textile and clothing imports of these products, but the European Community, in respect of the United Kingdom market, restricts imports in 13 MFA categories under the provisions of the bilateral agreement between the European Community and Brazil, negotiated under the Multi-Fibre Arrangement.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what extent exports from the United Kingdom to Taiwan of garments, fabrics, textiles, and clothing, are limited by import restrictions.

Mr. Channon: United Kingdom exports of garments, fabrics, textiles and clothing to Taiwan are subject to no quantitative restrictions, although import licences are required. Such licences are in general readily available.

Aerosol Containers

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to ensure that every aerosol container bears the words "Do not inhale" in relatively large letters.

Mr. Fletcher: No. I am afraid that although it would alert parents to the potential hazard, it would also serve to draw the attention of young people to the fact that the contents could be sniffed for intoxication.

Information Technology

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what part of his Department is currently charged with responsibility for work on co-ordination of information technology policy matters throughout Government; and whether there has been any recent change in arrangements for that work.

Mr. Pattie: I succeeded my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) last year as Minister of State for Industry and Information Technology.

Chrysoidine Dye

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has now received advice from the Minister of Health relating to the link between chrysoidine dye and cancer in anglers; if he will now consider updating his warnings to all angling bodies on the dangers of the alleged carcinogenic qualities of chrysoidine dye; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: I am still awaiting the advice of the Minister of Health, and I shall write to the right hon. Member when I have it.

Grants

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will introduce a regionally preferential system of high tech grants to encourage the development of high tech-manufacturing firms in the assisted regions;

(2) what are the reasons for the difference in the level of grants under the support for innovation programme to the south-east region and the Yorkshire and Humberside region;

(3) why Yorkshire and Humberside region has not received any payment of grant under the micro electronics industry support programme, the fibre optics, and the flexible manufacturing support for innovation schemes;

(4) if he will substantially increase the level of assistance to Yorkshire and Humberside under the support for innovation schemes.

Mr. Trippier: The Department's programme of support for innovation operates nationwide. The Department responds to applications submitted to it and grants are offered to projects that meet the Department's criteria. Firms in Yorkshire and Humberside are as eligible as firms in other regions to apply for the assistance available.

Regional variations in the numbers of grants offered reflect variations in the numbers of suitable applications received. Between May 1982 and March 1985 the South East region accounted for 43 per cent. of the applications received and 43 per cent. of the offers made. The equivalent figures for Yorkshire and Humberside were 7 per cent. and 8 per cent. respectively.

As at 31 March 1985 no applications had been received from Yorkshire and Humberside under the first microelectronics support programme and only one under the second stage, subsequently withdrawn. £1·1 million had been offered to firms in Yorkshire and Humberside to support fibre optics projects and payments of £727,000 had been made. £4·4 million had been offered to support flexible manufacturing systems and robotics projects in Yorkshire and Humberside and payments of £955,000 had been made.

The long-term aim of the Department's support for innovation is that of wealth creation. To maximise this aspect it is important to support those projects which offer the best rate of return to the country. This can only be done on a national basis and accordingly I have no plans to introduce a regionally preferential system.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the outcome of the recent investigation into citizens band radio abuse in Southampton.

Mr. Butcher: My Department's radio investigation service has a routine and continuous programme of enforcement action against CB and other radio users who cause radio interference and evade licence requirements. However in May RIS staff carried out a concentrated campaign to counter CB licence evasion and abuse in the Southampton and Portsmouth areas. During the campaign they visited 307 households in these areas, some more than once. They issued warnings to 87 CB users in connection with licence evasion and licence abuse. Most of those warned took measures to correct their position. The RIS also interviewed 25 users and seized their CB equipment for the purpose of possible court proceedings. The full results of the campaign will emerge and be monitored over the next few months. This was one of a number of concentrated CB campaigns carried out by the RIS at this time.

EC (Trade Barriers)

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by member country and sector of trade and commerce the barriers to trade between Great Britain and other countries in the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: There are in all member states a wide range of legal and administrative requirements which could be viewed as impeding free trade in goods and services. Individual firms' perceptions of which of these constitute barriers to trade vary considerably. Heads of Government at the European Council last month identified five categories where priority action should be taken to remove barriers to trade. These were:

—the removal of physical barriers to the free movement of goods within the Community.

—the removal of technical barriers to the free movement of goods within the Community (in particular the adoption of common or compatible standards for major new technologies in order to open up public purchasing and satisfy the needs of the economy).

—the creation of a free market in the financial services and transport sectors.

—the creation of full freedom of establishment for the professions.

—liberalisation of capital movement.

The European Commission also have identified some 300 measures where, in their view, action is necessary to remove barriers to trade. These are listed in the annex to their White Paper "Completing the Internal Market" published on 15 June, a copy of which is in the Library.

British Companies (Third World Income)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the income to British companies from the Third world over the last two years.

Mr. Channon: The available information relates to earnings on overseas direct investment by United Kingdom companies and their receipts from overseas Royalties and similar transactions from developing countries,* for 1982 and 1983, the latest two years available, and is as follows:

	£ million
1982	1,225·7
1983	1,340·7

The information is published in Business Monitor MA4.

* World excluding Western Europe, North America, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, South Africa and Eastern European centrally planned economies.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate how much in interest payments Britain and British companies received from the Third world from June to December 1984.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information is not available.

Sumrie Clothes plc

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will institute an inquiry under the Companies Acts into the activities of Sumrie Clothes plc, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Co-operatives

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will detail the provision being made for providing help and advice for co-operatives and for people wishing to set up co-operatives in 1986-87; and what provision is being made for the future funding of co-operative development agencies in the Greater London area presently funded by the Greater London council.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Tourism and Leisure (Report)

Mr. Howard asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects that the group set up under the chairmanship of the Minister without Portfolio to review obstacles to the development of tourism and leisure will report; and if the report will be published.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The group's report was published today and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. The report outlines the major and increasing contribution which tourism and leisure are making to the economy and describes action which the Government are taking to remove impediments to the industry's further growth.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing Inspectors

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many European inspectors are at present operating in fishing; what is the establishment strength; what is the length of the annual holidays to which they are entitled; and what arrangements are made to cover such holidays absences.

Mr. MacGregor: The European Commission advise that:

(i) Ten inspectors are at present operating in the EC Fisheries Inspectorate following staff resignations. The Commission is taking steps to recruit replacements to bring the inspectorate up to its authorised establishment of 13; one of these is expected to take up his post in September 1985.

(ii) European inspectors receive the normal holiday entitlements of European civil servants, which depend upon several factors including grade and length of service;

(iii) Holiday absences are planned to ensure that an adequate team of inspectors is on duty to cope with the programme of visits and any emergencies which might arise.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to how many vessels have been taken out of fishing in (a) Grimsby, (b) Hull, (c) Fleetwood, (d) Aberdeen and (e) Peterhead since 1 January 1983.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Number of vessels taken out of fishing since 1 January 1983

	Number
Grimsby	24
Hull	25
Fleetwood	17
Aberdeen	30
Peterhead	14
Total	110

Whirling Disease

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fish farms are still affected by whirling disease, giving names and locations; what progress is being made towards eliminating this disease in Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: There are at present 44 fish farms in Great Britain on which there are grounds for believing that the causative agent of whirling disease (Myxosoma cerebralis) may be found. However, there may be other sites where Myxosoma cerebralis is also present at sub-clinical levels and has not been identified.

The known 44 sites are 40 of the 44 sites in Great Britain which I listed in my reply to the right hon. Member of 26 March 1984 at column 24, excluding Mill Leat trout farm in Devon, Alderley trout farm in Gloucestershire, Test Valley Trout (Itchen Abbas) Ltd in Hampshire and Dalhounzie in Perthshire, and four additional sites:

Yorkshire water authority hatchery, Costa Beck, Pickering, North Yorkshire, Itchen Valley trout farm, Ladycroft, Near Alresford, Hampshire, Crystal Springs trout hatchery, Southend, Damerham, Fordingbridge, Hampshire, Chirk Fishery Co. Ltd, Chirk, Wrexham, Clwyd.

This occurrence of the disease has continued to be monitored in accordance with the policies announced in the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on 27 February 1984 at column 2.

Salmon

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many organisations have now been consulted regarding the introduction of a salmon tagging scheme to curb salmon poaching; what progress has been made; when he intends to introduce legislation on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: During the course of our examination of a possible salmon tagging scheme consultations have taken place with representatives of the water authorities, salmon farmers, processors, wholesalers, importers and retailers. Additionally I have met representatives of angling bodies, including the Salmon and Trout Association. As I said in answer to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on 16 May, examination has revealed a number of considerable difficulties and no decisions have yet been made. I shall make an announcement as soon as we have been able to reach a conclusion.

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received, and from which organisations, to ban drift netting for salmon off the Northumberland and North Yorkshire coastline; what message he has conveyed to them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Following the issue in 1981 of our consultation paper on the Review of Inland and Coastal Fisheries in England and Wales, in which we discussed the future of the English North East coast salmon fishery, representations were received from the Association of Scottish District Salmon Fishery Boards, the Salmon and Trout Association and the Scottish Salmon Angling Federation calling for the drift net fishery to be banned or phased out. Subsequently I have received further representations from some of these organisations and also from the Atlantic Salmon Trust Ltd., the River Tweed Commissioners and the Esk District Salmon Fishery Board.

In the 1981 consultation paper we said that this fishery should neither be closed nor phased out and the organisations concerned have been told that no evidence has since been produced to cause us to modify that view. However, the management arrangements for the fishery are under review and I will announce our conclusions when the review is completed.

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will now consider banning the use of drift nets and the use of nylon mono-filament gill nets in salmon fishing within the estuaries of British salmon rivers and the eastern coastline; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The use of drift nets and nylon monofilament gill nets for salmon fishing in English estuaries and coastal waters is strictly regulated by the water authorities. The management arrangements for the North East English drift net fishery are under review, as I have explained in reply to the right hon. Gentleman's question on that subject today. In addition the Ministry's directorate of fisheries research is keeping the effect of monofilament nets under review, but there has been no evidence so far that they cause more damage to fish escaping from them than multi-filament nets and I have no intention at present of introducing a general ban.

Pigs

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from pig farmers regarding financial assistance to the pig disease eradication fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Representations continue to be received about the cost of the Aujeszky's disease control and eradication scheme. I gave a full reply last month to the points made by the Agriculture Committee. Subsequently, I confirmed at a meeting with representatives of PDEF that the Government could not agree to making a subvention from central funds towards the cost of the scheme.

EMPLOYMENT

Skillcentre Instructors

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many skillcentre instructors are being made redundant or having to take early retirement because of skillcentre closures; and what financial arrangements are being made for such instructors.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No compulsory redundancies are expected amongst skillcentre instructors. Some instructors over the age of 60 will however be compulsorily retired. The number is not yet known and will depend upon how many instructors leave voluntarily.

The financial arrangements which will apply to staff retiring at 60 or over are embodied in the principal civil service pension scheme (PCSPS) and a shortened version of this document is held in the Library.

Preferred Suppliers Schemes

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the development by public sector bodies of preferred suppliers schemes comparable with the priority suppliers scheme contained in Treasury guidelines to Exchequer Departments.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to encourage local authorities and other public bodies to support and implement arrangements for giving preference towards purchasing goods and services from sheltered workshops and other priority suppliers along lines similar to those contained in the Treasury guidelines "Placing of Government Contracts with Non Profit Making Bodies" HQR 10.79.

The elements of such arrangements are contained in the priority suppliers directory, published by the Manpower Services Commission. A copy is in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in Norfolk are currently included in the unemployment statistics published on 4 July; and how many of these persons are currently registered for work at (a) jobcentres and (b) careers offices.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in Norfolk was 33,238. On the same date 755 unemployed non claimant school leavers under 18 were counted at careers offices in Norfolk. On 7 June there were 8,980 people registered for employment at jobcentres in the county. However this total is likely to represent only a small proportion of all unemployed jobseekers in the area who are actively looking for work. Jobseekers over 18 are no longer required to register at the jobcentre as a condition of claiming unemployment benefit nor is it necessary to register for unemployment to use the jobcentre. Many unemployed jobseekers find work, without registering, through the jobcentre's self-service vacancy display.

Jobseekers under 18 years of age are required to register at either a jobcentre or a careers office. According to administrative returns rendered by careers offices in Norfolk there were 2,611 unemployed young people registered at careers offices, on 13 June 1985.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the persons who are currently registered for work at jobcentres are (a) unemployed persons and (b) persons already in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether any analysis is now available as a result of the limited analysis made from the 1983 labour force survey providing figures for unemployed construction workers.

Mr. Alan Clark: Results from the labour force surveys for 1983 and 1984 are now available. These indicate that in the spring of 1983 there were about 257,000 persons in Great Britain who had had a job within the last three years and whose previous job had been in the construction industry who were without a paid job and seeking work. The corresponding estimate from the 1984 survey was 233,000.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs have been created in each of the last five years; how this compares with other European Economic Community countries; and if he will make a statement as to the trend.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about numbers of new jobs created is not available from official statistics, but information on net changes in civilian employment is available. The following table gives these changes for the United Kingdom and other European Community countries for each of the last five years. It shows that the rise in employment in the Community between 1983 and 1984 was the first since 1980. This rise was more than accounted for by employment growth in the United Kingdom.

Public Statutory Bodies (Worker Representatives)

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will permit worker representatives on public statutory bodies to be nominated by independent trade unions and others as well as the Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Workers' representatives are already nominated to some of those public bodies to which this Department makes appointments by workers' organisations not affiliated to the Trades Union Congress, where this is justified by the number of appointments to be made.

Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend section 28 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 relating to restrictions on disclosure of information.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have asked the Health and Safety Commission to advise whether the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 present any obstacles to the disclosure of information the public may reasonably need. In March the Commission published a discussion document "Access to health and safety information by members of the public" and will be giving its advice when it has studied the responses to the document. On the basis of that advice we shall consider the need for the Act to be amended.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is (a) the total of redundancy payments made to employees by their employers, or direct from the redundancy fund, under the terms of the Employment Protection Act and (b) the amounts paid from the redundancy fund in rebates to employers and direct payments to employees, in 1981 and the current year, to date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information for the past four years and the first quarter of 1985 is as follows:

	No. of statutory redundancy payments	Amount paid from Redundancy Fund £000
1981	809,639	415,671
1982	634,818	370,195

	No. of statutory redundancy payments	Amount paid from Redundancy Fund £000
1983	608,440	397,620
1984	425,178	300,059

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will ask the Chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to issue a public statement as to the precise circumstances in which the enterprise allowance scheme can be offered to persons seeking to engage in franchises; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The eligibility criteria for the enterprise allowance scheme are set out in "Guide to the Enterprise Allowance Scheme" and further advice on any points of interpretation can be obtained from jobcentres, which administer the scheme. The scheme is designed to help unemployed people set up their own businesses and not to support the extension of an existing enterprise. Accordingly, amongst eligibility conditions are requirements that the businesses established under the scheme should be new and independent. In many franchise arrangements under which the franchisor retains control of important aspects of the business such as sources of supplies, prices, market area, these conditions are not fully satisfied, although arrangements described as franchises are not by definition excluded.

Youth Training Schemes

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the extra funds which he promised to make available for encouraging extended periods of training to school leavers under the youth training scheme will be used to promote further schemes in the west midlands region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment on what criteria the Manpower Services Commission judge training centres and facilities and training officers provided by companies and organisations as being suitable for running youth training schemes; and if he will list the number of companies and organisations which the Manpower Services Commission have adjudged as inadequate for meeting the requirements of running these programmes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All organisations intending to operate youth training scheme programmes are required to submit detailed proposals to the Manpower Services Commission showing how they will meet the requirements of the scheme. These proposals are then considered for approval by the Manpower Services Commission and the area manpower boards. Information on the number of schemes not approved is not available centrally.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment on what factors he based the sum of £1 billion as being a suitable figure for providing resources to extend the youth training scheme from one to two years; and what proportion of that figure he expects to be made up from receipts from the European Social Fund and from non-payment of unemployment benefit.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In addition to the £800 million a year which it is spending on the present scheme, the Government is making an extra £900 million gross available for the two-year youth training scheme in 1987-88. Savings on benefit payments from the introduction of the new scheme are estimated at £150 million for that year. Receipts from the European Social Fund vary and cannot be predicted accurately.

Mr. Hamerck asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his most recent estimate of the proportion of B1 places on youth training schemes taken up in 1984-85; and what target figure the Government proposes for similar courses in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985, c. 297]: It is estimated that at the end of the 1984-85 year, in March 1985, over 70 per cent. of approved mode B1 places were occupied nationally and we expect a similar level to be reached in 1985-86.

Wages Councils

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will now list the advantages and disadvantages he took into account when reaching his decision to retain in existence the wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not possible to list comprehensively all the considerations taken into account. The decision was influenced by the weight of opinion in favour of reform expressed in employers' responses to the consultative paper on wages councils.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those organisations which responded to the consultative paper on the future of wages councils, indicating for each whether they favoured (i) retention, (ii) reform, or (iii) abolition of the councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible, and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, by wages council (i) the minimum wage rates at each age under 21 years old, giving hourly and weekly figures and (ii) the minimum annual holiday for under 21-year-olds.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is given in the orders made by wages councils. Copies are available in the Library.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs he estimates will be created by the proposal to reform the wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect these reforms to create employment opportunities but there are obvious difficulties in forecasting the number which will eventually be created.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the costs to businesses of compliance with the provisions of wages councils for each area covered.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not possible to make such an estimate.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, by wages council, the number of young workers to be affected by the changes proposed by him on 16 July.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for each year since 1979, at current and 1985 prices, the cost of administering the wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) on 27 November 1984 at column 442. I shall write to the hon. Member concerning the other information requested and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for each year since 1974, the number of wages inspectors, and for each year the average length of time between inspections for establishments covered by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The wages inspectorate's statistics are expressed in terms of the percentage of establishments checked each year. On that basis the following is the information requested.

	Number of wage inspectors in post	Per cent. of register checked
1974	130	10·0
1975	128	9·6
1976	125	8·8
1977	132	8·8
1978	143	10·1
1979	158	13·5
1980	155	12·7
1981	117·5	9·3
1982	116·0	10·1
1983	114·0	10·9
1984	113·0	10·8
July 1985	120·0	*

* NA

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will specify those existing functions and duties of wages councils which it is his policy to abolish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's statement on 17 July about the Government's intentions on the future of wages councils.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the evidence upon which he based his statement of 17 July, Official Report, column 327, regarding the alleged burdens placed upon business by the powers of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The evidence lies in the size and complexity of wages council orders and the comments of employers on the problems these present.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the cases referred to him in the House, Official Report, 17 July, column 330, of dismissal of young people, that have been reported to his Department in each of the last 12 months, as a result of the operation of minimum wage levels determined by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A number of such cases have been referred to in responses to the consultative paper, letters to Ministers and reports from wages inspectors.

Unemployed People

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he has any proposals for providing unemployed people with advice and information through centres for the unemployed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many centres for the unemployed are currently funded by the Manpower Services Commission; and if he will make a statement on his proposals to provide further help and assistance to unemployed people.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission currently funds 79 community programme projects providing advice and information through centres for the unemployed. The additional help to be provided for unemployed people was detailed by my right hon. Friend in the debate on the Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation on 21 March at columns 1024-1026 and in his statement on youth training on 1 July at column 24.

ILO Convention No. 26

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment on what precise date Her Majesty's Government intends to denatify International Labour Organisation convention no. 26.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Her Majesty's Government intends to communicate the instrument of denunciation to the Director General of the International Labour Office for registration on 25 July 1985. The denunciation will become effective one year after it is registered.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those countries which are presently signatories to the International Labour Organisation convention no. 26; and if he will indicate which, other than the United Kingdom, is considering denatification.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will write to the hon. Member with a list of the 97 countries out of a total of 151 member states of the International Labour Organisation who have ratified convention no. 26 and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Since no advance notice of denunciation of international labour conventions has to be given it is not possible to say whether other member states are considering denatification of convention no. 26.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the minimum wage rates of those Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries who are also signatories to the International Labour Organisation convention no. 26.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Details on the level of minimum wage rates in the European countries are given in an article in European Industrial Relations Review, No. 119, December 1983, pages 16 to 21. The International Labour Office report "Minimum Wage Fixing" by Gerald Starr, provides details for all countries in appendix 1, and more recent information for some countries is given in "Policies against low pay, an international perspective", published by the Policy Studies Institute (1984). These publications are available in the Library.

Young People's Wages

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the evidence on which he bases his conclusion that a reduction in young people's wages, relative to adult wages, would create additional new jobs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) on 21 February 1985 at column 516.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment by what percentage young people's wages, for boys and for girls, have fallen relative to adult rates since May 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 11 June 1985 at column 405, for the position to April 1984. Information for April 1985 will be available later this year.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has, by region, as to the average level of wages for 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20-year-olds; and what is the level of unemployment for these age groups, by region.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information covering both average earnings and the number of unemployed claimants by region for the individual ages requested is not available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal how many reports of Select Committees, excluding the Public Accounts Committee, have been issued since 1979; how many have been debated, naming the titles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The number of reports, other than special reports, of Select Committees, excluding the Public Accounts Committee, the Committee and Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and the Committee on European Legislation etc., published since 1979 is 359. In addition the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments has made 115 reports, the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments 194, and the Select Committee on European Legislation, and its predecessor, the Select Committee on European Secondary Legislation, 189.

Select Committee reports debated on motion in the House and referred to on the Order Paper as being relevant to debate in the House from October 1979 to April 1985 are listed in the appendix to the first report of the Liaison Committee on The Select Committee System, HC No. 363.

In addition, the following Select Committee reports, excluding those from the Public Accounts Committee, have been debated in the House or referred to on the Order Paper as being relevant to debate since April:

Debated on Motion:

Fifth Report from the Employment Committee on Wages Councils.

Referred to on the Order Paper as relevant to debate:

First Report from the Defence Committee on The Use of Merchant Shipping for Defence Purposes.

Third Report from the Defence Committee on Defence Commitments and Resources and the Defence Estimates 1985-86.

Third Report from the Environment Committee on the Department of Environment's Main Estimates 1985-86.

Fourth Report from the Environment Committee on the Property Services Agency Main Estimates, 1985-86.

First Report from the House of Commons (Services) Committee on Information Technology: Members' Requirements.

Second Report from the House of Commons (Services) Committee on Members' staff: Pressure on Accommodation and Facilities.

Second Report from the Social Services Committee on Community Care.

Third Report from Trade and Industry Committee on Trade with China.

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the Select Committee reports, excepting those of the Public Accounts Committee, whose recommendations have been accepted in full by Her Majesty's Government since 1979.

Mr. Biffen: Select Committee reports usually contain a number of recommendations, though that is not their only purpose. Many such recommendations have been accepted in full, but to analyse all reports, the Government replies to them and subsequent actions in the way requested would occasion undue expense.

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will give the annual figures of staff, full-time and part-time, serving the Select Committees since 1979 and the annual cost of manning these committees.

Mr. Biffen: The number of staff serving each Select Committee since 1979 is as follows, but in many cases Committee work comprises less than half the duties of the staff concerned:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85

* Of whom 2 are part-time.

In addition, in each of these years, there have been 10 members of staff (of whom one was part-time) the greater part of whose duties was to service Select Committees generally.

For the reason given in the answer to the right hon. Gentleman of 23 January 1985 (Hansard, column 456), the cost attributable to manning these Committees in each of these years could not be estimated without undue expense.

Mr. Boyes asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the places visited, the number of hon. Members travelling, and the cost of the air fare for each hon. Member for the latest visit by each Select Committee.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

Statutory Instruments (Procedure)

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Lord Privy Seal how often and when the second part of Standing Order 3(1)(b) relating to the putting of the question on motions on statutory instruments has been applied since 1960.

Mr. Biffen: Twice: on 20 December 1972 and 16 February 1983.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Aid

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the total resources available under the urban aid programme for 1984-85 and 1983-84; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: In each of the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 the cash resources made available for the urban programme in England were £348 million. The Government remain committed to tackling the special problems of the inner cities, and will continue to seek to apply the resources available for this purpose in the most efficient and cost-effective manner.

Thamesmead

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects consultations to begin on the future control of Thamesmead.

Sir George Young: In the late summer.

River Mersey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the projects that are part of the campaign to clean up the Mersey river and estuary and land alongside the water courses of the Mersey basin, indicating their scale, when they are to be completed, and the organisation responsible and their cost.

Mr. Waldegrave: The River Mersey Initiative, to which the hon. Member's question refers, is a long-term campaign which could take as much as 25 years because of the severe problems that have to be tackled. For the whole campaign, therefore, only broad estimates are possible. The North West water authority has estimated the total costs of the water quality side of the task at up to £2·5 billion. The work on the landward side will be carried out by the public, private and voluntary sectors between them; and its total value is estimated at around £1·5 billion. The detailed scheduling of projects, by the water authority and the local authorities, will be a continuous process related to successive stages of the campaign.

Housing Condition Survey

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the next housing condition survey for England and Wales to be published.

Mr. Gow: The next housing condition surveys, to be carried out separately for England and Wales, will be undertaken in 1986 and we intend to publish the results as soon as possible.

Green Belt

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the preservation of the green belt in Hertfordshire and the other home counties in the light of motorway developments such as the M25 London orbital route.

Mr. Macfarlane: The guidance in March 1984 to local authorities in the south-east on the M25 and land-use planning in the south-east made clear that the general presumption against development in the green belt is not affected by the M25 and that there should continue to be the strongest restraint on development there.

Gloucester Place Fire (Inquest Report)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take following representations he has received from the coroner who conducted the inquest into the deaths of Mrs. Karim and her two children at 46 Gloucester Place, London W1.

Sir George Young: When the results of the Department's research on houses in multiple occupation are available, my right hon. Friend will consider whether further measures are necessary, including any for means of escape from fire. In doing so, my right hon. Friend will have the coroner's representations very much in mind. Following consolidation of the Housing Acts, my right hon. Friend proposes to issue guidance to local authorities on their wide-ranging powers for houses in multiple occupation. My right hon. Friend will consider whether, in the light of the tragic fire at 46 Gloucester Place, it is necessary to re-emphasise the advice in DOE circular 25/82 about the need for consultations between authorities.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he has received a report from Her Majesty's coroner for Westminister following the inquest into the fire at Gloucester Place, Marylebone, in which a mother and two children died last November; what recommendations to him are contained in Her Majesty's coroner's report; whether he will place a copy in the Library; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he is taking in response to the representations he has received from the city of Westminister concerning the need for legislation to require fire safety precautions in houses in multiple occupation.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I have given to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) today. I have received representations in the form of a letter from the coroner, which I am studying. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with the agreement of the coroner, will place a copy of the coroner's representations in the Library. As to the representations made by the city of Westminister, I refer my hon. Friend to the letters dated 23 April and 17 June which he has received from my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction.

Onshore Oil Exploration

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the places throughout the United Kingdom in relation to onshore oil exploration within the last two years where planning permission (a) has been sought, (b) has been obtained and (c) has been refused in instances where planning permission has been granted (1) work has commenced, (2) work has not commenced and (3) work has been completed; and if he will list those locations where oil has been found (i) in commercial quantities and (ii) in non-commercial quantities.

Mr. Macfarlane: Details of planning applications relating to onshore oil exploration submitted to and determined by local planning authorities are not collected centrally. Within the last two years one planning appeal has been determined following refusal of permission on an application to drill an exploratory well. On 26 June 1985, Conoco (UK) Limited was given planning permission for this well at Normandy, Surrey. One condition of the permission is that work on this shall begin within five years. Details of company work programmes and results of exploration activity are not required by my Department.

Salford

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider making a special grant in 1985-86 to Salford district council from the surplus of £400 million which will accrue from the penalties imposed by his Department on local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. The Secretary of State has no power to redistribute grant holdback due to the overspending of targets.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the effect of the change in the multiplier factor in the current year on payment by his Department to Salford city council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Had the multiplier remained at the 1984-85 level, Salford would have received £4,481,000 more grant.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report his conclusions following his discussions with elected representatives and officers of Salford city council regarding the current rate support grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, who met a delegation from Salford on 14 March, concluded that no change should be made in the city council's multiplier.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the findings and recommendations of the report on, A Case for a Special Grant of £6 million, for Salford district council, a copy of which has been sent to him by Mr. Keith Hirst; if he will publish in the Official Report his reply; if there is any action he will now be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall send the hon. Member a copy of my Department's reply in due course.

Block Grant

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reconsider the working of the multiplier factor as used in calculating the block grant for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are not persuaded there is a case for reworking the multiplier.

"Local Authority Housing Repairs and Maintenance Needs"

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the Royal Institute of British Architects' publication "Local Authority Housing Repair and Maintenance Needs", a copy of which he has received, which relates to matters within his responsibility.

Sir George Young: I read this report with great interest.

My Department is now processing local authorities' responses to our own recent inquiry into the repair and improvement needs of local authority housing stock; we hope that first results will be available by the end of this month. It will be useful to compare RIBA's findings with our own.

Baby Seal Products

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the expiry on 30 September of the European ban on the import of baby seal products.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) on 9 July, at column 395. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had previously made clear our support for an extension of the ban on conservation grounds in her reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on 21 June, at column 230.

I hope that agreement will be reached soon in the European Council on an extension of the ban.

Planning Permission

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to make potential damage to neighbouring property a reason for refusing planning permission.

Mr. Macfarlane: I assume that my hon. Friend has in mind physical damage resulting from building operations or other activities on neighbouring land. Any landowner whose property is damaged by another's actions has means of redress through the courts and it is unnecessary to make the matter one for planning control. If my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind I would be glad to look at it.

System-built Housing

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department (a) has conducted and (b) is conducting, into the defects of post-war system-built housing.

Mr. Gow: The Building Research Establishment has a continuing role in identifying lessons to be learnt from problems found in housing, and other types of buildings.

The BRE has carried out a major investigation of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses designed before 1960 and has published several reports. It has also reported on the Smith system.

The BRE is now engaged in a programme of research into large panel systems of construction and has published a report on Ronan Point and other Taylor Woodrow/Anglian buildings. BRE has begun work aimed at producing advice on the inspection, maintenance and, where necessary, repair of steel framed houses.

Anglian Water Authority

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied that the external financing limits of the Anglian water authority are adequate to enable the water and sewage infrastructure necessary to support the projected growth in housing and commercial developments to be provided; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes. Anglian Water's 1985-86 external financing limit was set taking into account the authority's 1984 plan estimates of the investment needed to meet new demand, and later estimates are lower. The 1986-87 external financing limit will not be settled before late this autumn.

Water Authorities

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which water authorities have applied for derogations in respect of organochlorines under the European Commission directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption (80/778/EEC); in respect of each authority, what were the sources of the organochlorines which give rise to the application for these derogations; and whether he intends to permit these derogations.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have received five applications from Anglian water authority, two from Thames water authority and one each from the Mid Kent and the Sunderland and South Shields water companies for derogations under the directive in respect of chlorine containing trihalomethanes, a group of organochlorine compounds covered by parameter 32 of the directive. These organochlorine compounds arise as a result of reaction between organic compounds naturally present in the source water and chlorine which is added to ensure that the water supplied is free from harmful bacteria. After taking medical advice, I have granted these derogation applications and I shall review them in three years.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the membership of the Nature Conservancy Council's advisory committees for England, Wales and Scotland; and if he will indicate the profession or occupation of the members and the date of their retirement from the committee.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the size of the Nature Conservancy Council budgets to cover (a) land purchase by voluntary bodies, (b) land management, education and promotion by voluntary bodies and (c) the small grants programme; and what limits upon maximum or minimum levels of grant or support have been set by him or his Department for each of the above categories.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985]: The figures are:

(a) £900,000
(b) £650,000
(c) £180,000

Neither I nor the Department have set maximum or minimum levels of grant, though in certain cases the Department's prior approval is required.

Housing (Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the housing investment programme allocation made to the city of Manchester for 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 at constant prices.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

LECA Houses

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is now ready to publish the results of the LECA plan prefrabricated houses investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The LECA plan system is one of a number under investigation by the Building Research Establishment as part of its programme of research into large panel systems of construction. Reports on different aspects of this research will be published in due course, but there will not necessarily be a separate report on the LECA plan.

Local Authority Services

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the names of those who have submitted views on competition in the provision of local authority services; and if he will indicate in each case whether they are in favour or against such a proposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall arrange for the list of respondents to be published in the Official Report as soon as possible. The proposals do not, however, lend themselves to a simplistic response analysis of the sort requested. I shall consider how best to make the results of consultation available to the House.

Houses (Improvement for Sale Schemes)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the grant levels for improvement for sale schemes being undertaken by local authorities.

Sir George Young: No.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding grant levels for local authority improvement for sale schemes.

Sir George Young: Two local authorities have requested an increase in the limit for Exchequer contributions towards local authority improvement for sale schemes. This issue was also raised by the Association of District Councils at the meeting of the Housing Consultative Council on 10 June.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether Interaction or any of its subsidiaries is receiving either capital or revenue funding from the London Docklands Development Corporation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps the London Docklands Development Corporation has taken to ensure that the design of houses on London Docklands Development-owned land contains provisions for the disabled;

(3) what percentage of houses on London Docklands Development Corporation-owned land (a) represent transfers to households who were previously on other London Docklands Development Corporation-owned sites and (b) are owned by the second or subsequent purchasers of the house;

(4) what steps the London Docklands Development Corporation intends to take to ensure that the composition of private housing estates on London Docklands Development Corporation-owned land reflects the multicultural nature of London;

(5) what training programmes are used within the London Docklands Development Corporation to create awareness of racism and sexism;

(6) whether the London Docklands Development Corporation requires clauses in its contracts of employment to specify that racial and sexual harassment at work is a disciplinary issue;

(7) what arrangements exist for advertising posts in the London Docklands Development Corporation; and which newspapers, including black and ethnic minority newspapers, are used to place advertisements;

(8) how many advisers the London Docklands Development Corporation employs with a specific knowledge of relevant employment and equal opportunity legislation;

(9) how many people with disabilities are employed by the London Docklands Development Corporation; and at what grades;

(10) how many women are employed by the London Docklands Development Corporation; and at what grades.

Sir George Young: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of permanent staff directly employed by the London Docklands Development Corporation as at 31 March 1982, 31 March 1983, 31 March 1984 and 31 March 1985.

Sir George Young: The total number of permanent staff employed by the LDDC were:

	Number
At 31 March 1982	69
At 31 March 1983	74
At 31 March 1984	92
At 31 March 1985	90

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses on London Docklands Development Corporation-owned land have been transferred to households from the black or ethnic minority communities.

Sir George Young: This information is not collected.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether there is provision for both maternity and paternity leave within the London Docklands Development Corporation.

Sir George Young: It is the corporation's policy to provide maternity leave. Paternity leave is not generally available, but is considered under the broader definition of compassionate leave.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether personnel in the London Docklands Development Corporation are specifically employed to shortlist and appoint staff.

Sir George Young: Yes.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals for providing additional moneys under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 for the London borough councils in 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future funding of organisations funded under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 by the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties which have received his approval for funding in 1985-86 under his powers in section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Section 137 expenditure by the GLC is discretionary expenditure, and it is for borough councils, and other successor bodies where appropriate, to decide whether to give support to organisations which the GLC has grant-aided under this power. Where such bodies are voluntary organisations, the Government have provided powers for boroughs to support them under a collective scheme. In addition, there is a programme of central Government grant-aid for individual boroughs taking over grants to voluntary organisations.

Approval of GLC section 137 expenditure in 1985-86 by the Secretary of State under the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 carries with it no implied view about the desirability or otherwise of such expenditure in that or subsequent years.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on the future of those organisations presently funded partly by the Greater London council and partly by the Government's urban programme;

(2) whether the Government plan to provide the additional resources to those organisations which are currently funded under the urban programme and who receive part funding from the Greater London council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Where an organisation receives urban programme funding through the GLC, and this funding is due to continue beyond 31 March 1986, the Secretary of State will make the urban programme grant available to the successor borough. The urban programme grant will then continue until its expiry date, after which it will, if necessary, be considered for possible renewal.

Where, in addition to urban programme funding, either through the GLC or a borough, an organisation is receiving support from the GLC's main programmes, it will look to the appropriate borough council to replace that element of its funding. Inherited expenditure of this type which is not eligible for UP support will be eligible for support under the transitional grant arrangements.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals for the funding of recording studios providing training for young black people in the inner city area, presently funded by the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: Responsibility for funding voluntary organisations currently funded by the GLC will pass to the London boroughs, individually and collectively. The Government have taken a number of steps, including transitional grant support to boroughs, to help the boroughs take on this role. To the extent that recording studios providing training are voluntary organisations, they will fall within this arrangement. Commercial organisations providing training may also be able to obtain support from a borough council, or may be eligible for MSC support.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permanent local residents were employed in the construction of the Falkland Islands airport; and what was the total number employed in the construction of the airport.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring up to date the answer of 1 March 1984, Official Report, columns 330-31, concerning the Exchequer contribution to local government expenditure at settlement and outturn and if he will estimate the cost in the current financial year if the outturn reaches 65 per cent.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985]: Following is the available information:

Aggregate Exchequer Grant as a Percentage of Relevant Expenditure (England)

	At Settlement	At Outturn/ Budget
1981-82	59·1	54·9
1982-83	56·1	51·7
1983-84	52·8	49·8
1984-85	51·9	48·3
1985-86	48·7	45·9

Source: Latest Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report for each year.
Note: Outturn/Budget percentages are affected by Holdback of block grant.

Because block grant is cash limited, for AEG to reach 65 per cent. of outturn, local authority outturn relevant expenditure would have to be reduced by a massive amount. The effect of this upon grants paid by central Government would depend upon the resulting specific grants and holdback.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Foreign Policy Statements

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all joint EC foreign policy statements since June 1979; and whether copies of all such statements are placed in the Library.

Mr. Rifkind: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend on 26 June to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and my reply on 15 July to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). Copies of statements made in recent years were placed in the Library when they were issued.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH

North Korea

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with North Korea.

Mr. Luce: We do not recognise North Korea as a state and have no diplomatic relations with the authorities there.

Ugandan Asians

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the state of progress in the various compensation and repossession claims outstanding since the expulsion of Ugandan Asians from Uganda in the early 1970s; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 22 May.

Antarctic (Conservation Areas)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response Her Majesty's Government have made to the proposals for 26 new conservation areas in the Antarctic by the Scientific Committee for Antarctic Research, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Renton: We are aware of this initiative but have not yet received the Scientific Committee's detailed proposals. While we accept the general principle behind them, we shall need to study the proposed management plans for each conservation site before deciding whether to support them. Eight of the sites proposed by the committee lie outside the Antarctic treaty area and are the concern of the French authorities.

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy not to take disciplinary action against staff at Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham, who have rejoined their unions until the conclusion of discussions on the subject between union leaders and the Cabinet Secretary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: On 9 May the general secretaries of the Civil Service trade unions made representations to the Secretary of the Cabinet about members of staff at Government communications headquarters who notified management that they had joined or rejoined a union contrary to the undertaking they had previously given. The Secretary of the Cabinet agreed to consider their representations and that in the meantime no action would be taken against those concerned.

PLO (Jordan)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's ambassador in Amman has reported to him on the address in Jordan on 9 July by Khalil Al-Wazir to the armed men of the Palestine Liberation Organisation expelled to Jordan from Lebanon by Syria calling for armed confrontation with Israel; and whether any message has been conveyed to King Hussein about armed guerrillas being permitted to be based in Jordan.

Mr. Luce: No.

Chile

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have invited, or intend to invite, further Chilean Government officials to visit the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: We have normal diplomatic relations with Chile. It follows that we should have regular contacts with Chilean officials.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government intend to take regarding the case of Pedro Fernandez Lembach now that the Chilean authorities have said that they will not consider an application for his sentence to be commuted to one of exile.

Mr. Renton: As he is a Chilean national we have no formal standing to intervene on Sr. Lembach's behalf with the Chilean authorities, but Her Majesty's ambassador will continue to remind them of our willingness to grant Sr. Fernandez Lembach a visa to enter the United Kingdom in the event that they should decide to commute his sentence to one of exile.

Baby Seal Products

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Danish Government about the renewal of the European ban on the import of baby seal products.

Mr. Rifkind: The Community is currently considering proposals put forward by the Commission for an indefinite extension of the European Community ban on imports of baby seal products which expires on 30 September. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear our support for an extension of the ban on conservation grounds in her reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on 21 June. This position was placed on record by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Bristol West (Mr. Waldegrave) at the 28 June Environment Council, at which Denmark was of course represented.

SCOTLAND

Legal Services

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the recommendations for change made by the last Royal Commission on legal services in Scotland have been implemented to date.

Mr. Ancram: The report of the Royal Commission contained over 200 recommendations, many of which did not call for Government action. The Government have already taken and announced decisions on many of the recommendations addressed to them and will make any further announcement on matters covered by the report in due course.

Glasgow Housing

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received from Glasgow district council a registration scheme under section 100 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1966; and when he hopes to announce his decision.

Mr. Ancram: No formal registration has been received. However, as I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 1 July 1985, at column 24, my officials are currently considering proposals for a registration scheme submitted informally by Glasgow district council. It is hoped to send a response in the near future.

Salmon

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has now completed all his consultations in Scotland on a salmon tagging scheme to curb salmon poaching; what organisations have offered resistance; whether he is able to report progress; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The consultations have been completed. Several difficulties have been identified in connection with the tagging of imports and farmed salmon, and the control and security of tags. The main opposition to tagging in Scotland has come from fish farmers who are concerned about the disruptive effect of tagging on their activities, and from organisations representative of anglers who regard tagging as an unnecessary imposition. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State is still considering this issue, along with other Fisheries Ministers.

Home Improvement Grants

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the precise sums made available for house improvement grants by the Government for each of the last 20 years to date in (a) Scotland and (b) the Lothian region, giving separate figures for each category and year.

Mr. Ancram: Housing authorities are not given specific allocations for capital expenditure on house improvement grants. Since 1978-79, when the system of block capital allocations for housing was introduced, expenditure on house improvement grants has formed a major share of the non-HRA block, which also covers lending for house purchase (other than to council tenants), repairs grants, slum clearance and various minor items.

Individual authorities are free to determine their own spending priorities within the total non-HRA block allocations made available to them.

The following table gives total consent to incur capital expenditure on the non-HRA block for each year in (a) Scotland and (b) the districts of Lothian region. Comparable information is not available for the years prior to 1978-79.

	Scotland £ million	Lothian districts £ million
1978-79	50·0	13·5
1979-80	48·6	8·6
1980-81	59·4	12·3
1981-82	77·0	17·1
1982-83	106·6	21·5
1983-84*	98·1	16·3
1984-85	171·4	20·6
1985-86†	109·7	17·5

* Expenditure on improvement grants in 1983-84, subject to certain conditions, was not limited to consent.

† As issued at 29 March 1985.

Note: Figures for the years to 1984-85 include abatement, enhancement and any transfers to or from the HRA block.

Housing Associations

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are the most up-to-date figures for all sales of housing association houses in (a) Scotland and (b) the Lothian region to sitting tenants; what percentage this represents of housing association stock in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many housing association houses of general needs housing have been sold with a discount in (a) Scotland and (b) the Lothian region; what percentage this represents of housing association stock in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The total numbers of housing association houses sold to sitting tenants in Scotland and in Lothian region up to 30 June 1985 were, respectively, 76 and 21; all sales were of general needs houses. Fifty-three of the Scottish sales and 16 of those in Lothian region were made at a discount. Each of these totals represents less than 1 per cent. of the housing association stock in Scotland.

I have been concerned for some time that the voluntary code governing sales to housing association tenants in Scotland has not been operating with sufficient effect. At my request the Housing Corporation wrote some months ago to all associations which had not already instituted a sales scheme with discounts, requesting them to reconsider their policies. Its letter was accompanied by an open letter from me in which I restated the Government's position on voluntary sales and stressed the importance of discounts to the success of any sales policy. I subsequently received a report from the Housing Corporation on the outcome of the exercise. I had hoped for a substantial movement in associations' policies but this has proved not to be the case. Although there has been some movement, a considerable number of associations have reaffirmed their opposition to sales and others who permit sales will not provide discounts.

In view of this response, and the need to ensure that housing association tenants do not remain at a significant disadvantage in comparison with other public sector tenants, we propose to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity to give housing association tenants the right to buy their homes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many housing association houses of (a) general needs housing, (b) special needs housing and (c) co-ownership housing there are in Scotland and Lothian region today: giving separate figures for each category.

Mr. Ancram: Estimated figures provided by the Housing Corporation are given in the following table for 31 March 1984, the latest date for which estimates can be made.

Area	Number of houses General needs	Special needs	Co-ownership
Scotland	25,000	6,800	900
Lothian	4,100	2,400	100

National Health Service

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent on each person resident in (a) Scotland and (b) the Lothian region in respect of National Health Service funding in Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is given in the table to the latest available year. The figures are based on expenditure on hospital and community health services and on family practitioner services (net of charges retained by practitioners). Details of expenditure by the common services agency and on programmes managed centrally by the Department are not available for health board areas.

Expenditure per head of population

	Scotland £	Lothian health board £
1979-80	191	208

1981-82	275	307
1982-83	298	332
1983-84	317	350

Nursery Schools

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers of nursery school places in (a) Scotland and (b) the Lothian region for each year since 1973; and whether it is the policy of the Government to expand nursery education.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The following table shows the number of pupils receiving nursery education in education authority schools in Lothian region and in Scotland for the school years from 1973.

Pupils receiving nursery education

	Lothian	Scotland
1973	n/a	19,629

Education authorities are free to determine the priority to be accorded to nursery education in the light of other resource demands.

NHS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) nurses and (b) doctors have been employed in Scotland by the National Health Service in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested by whole-time equivalent numbers is as follows:

	Nurses*	Doctors† (excluding general medical practitioners)	Doctors‡ (including general medical practitioners)
1975	52,540·0	5,213·1	8,219·1
1976	53,405·0	5,313·9	8,354·9

Assisted Place Schemes

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been allocated to the assisted places scheme in Scotland each year for the last five years (a) in total and (b) for each educational authority.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Total expenditure on the scheme in the four years it has been operating is as follows:

	£ million
1981-82	0·512
1982-83	1·393
1983-84	2·225
1984-85	3·069

These figures, which relate to fiscal years, cannot readily be attributed to education authority areas. The grants are paid direct to the participating schools, and they submit their claims in relation to the academic year, not the financial year.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many pupils have benefited from the assisted places scheme in Scotland each year for the last five years (a) in total and (b) for each educational authority.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Pupils at participating schools may come from outwith the area of the education authority in which the schools are located but the number of places taken up in schools in each local authority area since the scheme began is as follows:

Skoal Bandit

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department was consulted by the Scottish Development Agency before money was put into the production of the Skoal Bandit.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In accordance with practice, this inward investment project was handled by Locate in Scotland, which is a joint operation of the Industry Department for Scotland and the Scottish Development Agency.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average pay rise for teachers in Scotland; and what was the annual inflation rate in each year since 1955.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Comparable figures for teachers' average salaries over so extended a period are not available.

Gaelic Language

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the amount of direct expenditure by his Department on the Gaelic language in 1984-85; if he will provide a breakdown ; and what the percentage increase in spending has been compared to the 1983-84 level.

Mr. George Younger: The Scottish Education Department made the following direct payments to organisations and projects connected with the Gaelic language in 1984-85:

An Comunn Gaidhealach	69,300
Sabhal Mor Ostaig	11,750
The Committee on Gaelic of the Consultative Committee on the Curriculum	3,320
Research grant for the Evaluation of the Western Isles Island Council Bilingual Project	30,803
	115,173

This is an increase of 25 per cent. over 1983-84. These figures exclude the amounts given to support the Gaelic language by the Scottish Arts Council and the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the secondary schools in Scotland which teach subjects using Gaelic as the teaching medium.

Mr. Allan Stewart: For September 1983 the following table shows:

(a) The number of secondary schools where subjects other than Gaelic were taught using Gaelic as the teaching medium;

(b) The number of secondary schools in Gaelic speaking areas where the scheme of instruction provided for teaching the Gaelic language and literature to Gaelic speaking pupils.

Standard Grade Examination

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a further statement on future arrangements for standard grade examinations in the light of the teachers associations' continuing boycott of curriculum development.

Mr. George Younger: I announced on 2 April, at columns 543-44], that I had decided, following advice from the Scottish Examination Board and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities that ordinary grade examinations in English, mathematics and arithmetic should be available as an option in 1986 for pupils who started standard grade courses in August 1984 and whom it was no longer realistic to expect to be assessed on the basis of standard grade. I made it clear that standard grade phase 1 assessments would take place in 1986 as planned and I confirm that again now.

A number of parents and others have made representations to me about the importance of an early decision on examinations in 1987 to protect the interests of pupils entering S3 next month who will wish to know whether the target at the end of their two-year course is to be standard grade or ordinary grade. The Scottish Education Department has therefore written today to the Scottish Examination Board, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, and the Scottish Council of Independent Schools, to propose that the same arrangements should apply in 1987 as in 1986, that is, that ordinary grade examinations should be available as an alternative to standard grade phase 1 examinations in 1987.

I have asked the three bodies for their urgent comments on this proposal so that a final decision may be taken as early as possible in the new term to relieve the uncertainty which parents are experiencing about the courses which their children will follow. I recognise that the holding of both standard grade and ordinary grade examinations for a further year will have implications for higher grade and post-higher examinations in English and mathematics and I have asked the SEB to take account of the need to run these examinations in both unrevised and revised forms in 1988.

The Government remain in principle fully committed to the development and full implementation of standard grade courses, which will lead to more effective and relevant teaching for pupils of all abilities. The largest Scottish teachers union has however made clear its intention to continue the curricular boycott even after a satisfactory settlement of the current pay dispute is reached.

New Towns (Housing)

Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what, in respect of each of the Scottish new town development corporations in each of the years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive, and 1985-86 to date, were (i) the categories of applicants whose waiting time from acceptance of application to allocation of a dwelling was greatest and the average waiting time from such categories and the categories of applicants whose waiting time was shortest and the average waiting time for such categories and (ii) the numbers of and sizes of private sector houses and flats in each of the said years to 31 March which were (a) completed and (b) sold on a basis which included any element of subsidy or financial assistance by the development corporation and the total amount of such subsidy or financial assistance.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1985, c. 156]: The replies are

(i) such information as is available about average waiting time for categories of applicant on the housing waiting lists maintained by new town development corporations is not compiled on a uniform basis and does not enable me to give a meaningful reply.

(b) Twenty-nine private sector houses and flats were sold during this period on a basis which included an element of subsidy or financial assistance from the development corporation. All 29 were in Cumbernauld, nine sold in 1984-85 and 20 sold in 1985-86 to date. The aggregate notional amount of the assistance was £9,796 and £21,366 respectively. This was in the context of a joint venture with private builders where the development corporation sold the land at historic cost, rather than on the basis of current market value.

Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what, in respect of each of the Scottish new town development corporations in each of the years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive, and 1985-86 to date, were (i) the number of persons on waiting lists for houses to let at 1 April and 1 October and (ii) the numbers of and sizes of corporation houses at 31 March (a) completed and first let (b) vacated and re-let (c) sold to sitting tenants (d) sold with vacant possession and (e) sold on a shared equity basis.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1985, c. 156]: The replies are: (i) I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 19 June 1985, at column 133.

Electronics Industry

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the components of change such as openings, expansions, contractions and closures in terms of male and female employment and number of units in the electronic sector since 1979 (a) for Scotland as a whole and (b) for each of the Scottish regions.

Mr. George Younger [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 256]: The only available source for components of change analysis is the regional data system (RDS) which relates to units with 11 or more employees and classifies units according to their latest current activity. Estimates from RDS are set out in the table, for the electronics sector; they relate to the 1980 standard industrial classification. Details by sex are not available.

The reclassification of units under RDS into the electronics industry, as the balance of their production has moved in favour of electronics, has had the effect of boosting the 1979 figure shown in the table. By way of illustration estimated employment for the electronics sector from the 1978 census of employment was 37,000 whereas the corresponding RDS figure for 1978 is 47,000 — and the reclassification of units since 1978 is the major factor in the difference.

This means that I do not regard the movements in the overall employment figures in the table as at all representative of the trend in employment in the electronics sector for Scotland. Later this year I hope to have estimates based on units classified according to their activities at the relevant times.

Notes

(1) The electronics sector is defined to be Activity Headings 3302, 3433, 3441, 3442, 3443, 3444, 3453, 3454, 3710 and 3732 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification.

(2) The industry classification of a unit may change over time. For the purpose of the tables above, a unit is classified on the bases of its latest known industry. This convention will tend to overstate electronics in 1979 in view of the tendency of units to be reclassified into the electronics sector.

(3) The above estimates are derived from the Regional Data System.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Westminster Hospital

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of Westminster hospital, London.

Mr. John Patten: Planning services at the Westminster hospital is in the first instance the responsibility of the new Riverside health authority. We are not aware of any proposals by the authority to change its current role.

National Insurance Contributions

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of people likely to be affected under the proposed new national insurance contribution arrangements, at £55 and £90, when overtime or bonus payments take their wages just over the new limits.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the form requested.

The latest figures for earnings on which national insurance contributions have been paid relate to the 1982-83 tax year. In that year 189,600 men and 271,900 women paid contributions on annual earnings in the range £2,700-£3,000 (weekly equivalent £51·92-£57·69) and 382,800 men and 279,500 women paid contributions on annual earnings in the range £4,500-£4,799 (weekly equivalent £86·54-£92·29). It is not known how many of these people received bonus or overtime payments.

These 1982-83 figures should be used with caution to produce any current estimate on the lines sought by my hon. Friend. Current earnings will be different because of the general upward trend. Moreover, because the Department does not record actual earnings the figures quoted are notional earnings calculated from the record of contributions paid. This calculation does not produce an accurate earnings figure for each person.

The steps in liability at £55 and £90 per week under the proposed new arrangements are small—both in absolute terms and in relation to the existing "cliff edge" of liability at the lower earnings limit (£35·50): modest pay rises at these two steps will result in net increases in take home pay. All employees earning under £90 per week will be better off than at present—some 4·3 million.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the forecast payment of contributions to national insurance in 1985 by employers, employees and the self-employed; and if he will provide separate figures for the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary's estimates for 1985-86 are in the table. No separate figures for the manufacturing sector are available.

	£ million
Class I (employed)
Primary (employees)	10,768
Secondary (employers)	12,158
Class II (self-employed)	680

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what revenue is brought in by the reduced rate contributions to national insurance.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary estimates that the class 1 primary (employees) receipts during 1985-86 from married women and widows who have opted to pay reduced rate contributions will be around £275 million.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what revenue is brought in by (a) the employee's national insurance contribution and (b) the employer's contribution in a full financial year.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary's estimates of class 1 receipts during 1985-86 are:—

	£ million
Class 1 primary (employees)	10,768
Class 1 secondary (employers)	*12,158

* This figure does not take account of recoveries of statutory sick pay by employers.

Single Payments

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the actual maximum single payment made to meet the costs of a newborn baby in 1983; and what was the actual minimum payment made.

Mr. Whitney: Reliable figures cannot be given, since the annual statistical inquiry is based on a sample of cases and information about the individual maximum and minimum payments is unlikely to be representative.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if single payments for help with bus and rail fares for hospital visits are to be abolished under the proposals of the social security review.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 2·98 of volume 2 of the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security".

Birth Statistics

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the estimate of the number of live births to mothers of New Commonwealth and Pakistani descent who themselves were born in the United Kingdom for 1983 or for the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

(2) if he will estimate for 1981, 1982 and 1983 the number of births to mothers of New Commonwealth and Pakistani ethnic origin, excluding those of mixed descent who themselves were born in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available from the data collected at birth registration. However, preliminary estimates based on results derived from the 1983 labour force survey suggest that, during the period mid-1980 to mid-1983, between 4,000 and 5,000 children were born in the United Kingdom each year to mothers of New Commonwealth and Pakistani descent who themselves had been born in the United Kingdom.

Convalescent Facilities

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of places in specifically designated National Health Services convalescent facilities for each year from 1980.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is given in the table.

NHS hospitals, England—Convalescent departments

Year	Average daily number of available beds
1980	534
1981	432
1982	302
1983	313

These figures exclude contractual arrangement facilities. The reason for the reduction in beds was given in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 8 July at column 363.

Benefits

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he has made to provide people whose claims for social security benefits are refused with the addresses of local agencies offering advice and information about social security benefits.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) on 17 July.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total value per week to a disabled married claimant in 1985-86 (i) on the ordinary rate and (ii) on the long-term rate of (a) the disablement heating addition and (b) the laundry and special diet allowance, assuming additional resources to cover 20 per cent. of average rate bills were met on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Newton: On the same basis as my reply to the hon. Member on 3 July, at column 182, the implied amount for a disabled married claimant receiving the three additions named would be as follows:

Ordinary scale rate £	Long-term scale rate £
54·86	65·41

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the amount currently being spent on unemployment pay and on the various classes of benefit at an annual rate;

(2) what is the current cost per week of benefits of all kinds paid to persons who are unemployed and their dependants.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated cost of social security benefits paid in respect of unemployment in 1985-86 is £6·4 billion; equivalent to an average weekly expenditure of £123 million. The annual figure is made up of £1,645 million in unemployment benefit, about £3,850 million in supplementary benefit and about £950 million in housing benefit.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department is to hold a survey to find out what has been the effect on people of his policy of a limited National Health Service drugs list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We can see no need for such a survey.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will ask the review committee on the limited list to examine restoring Rohypnol (flunitrazepam) to the list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The recently established Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs will be free to reconsider at any time the need for Rohypnol, either on its own initiative or in response to representations from doctors or the manufacturers. No formal representations have yet been made about this drug.

Earnings Limit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Government will now raise the earnings limit for the long-term unemployed to £10.

Mr. Newton: One of the proposals in the recent Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9518) is that for supplementary benefit claimants the earnings disregard for couples who have been unemployed for two years should be raised to £15. We hope to introduce these proposals from April 1987 and have no plans to raise the earnings limit in the meantime.

Departmental Staff (Newcastle)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many extra staff were taken on by his Department during the strike at the computer centre at Newcastle; how many of the posts occupied by such staff have been retained; and what plans he has for the future of those retained posts.

Mr. Whitney: Three thousand additional posts were allocated and filled to deal with the consequences of the Newcastle dispute. Some staff so employed have now been allocated to ordinary departmental work, but detailed information is not available. The Department's manpower targets remain at present as published in the latest expenditure report.

Computer Facilities (Data Privacy)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the data privacy implications of using national insurance numbers as indentifiers in existing and planned computerised data facilities at his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We are fully aware of the need to maintain the privacy and confidentiality of personal information. National insurance numbers are used as identifiers in a number of clerical or computer systems. We are reviewing the arrangements for preserving confidentiality in all computerised systems in the light of the Data Protection Act. In the development of new systems, full account is taken of the need to maintain confidentiality and to comply with the Act.

Local Offices (Computers)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what projections of anticipated staff savings from general implementation were made prior to the trial programme of microcomputers in local offices; what subsequent assessment was made of likely savings in staff from general implementation in the light of experience of the programme; and if he will make a statement on the implications of the outcome of the trial programme for other computerisation projects in his Department.

Mr. Whitney: An original estimate of savings of 600 posts was made regarding the microcomputerisation of supplementary benefit assessment work. The trial programme carried out in 1984, which related to a broader range of work, suggested savings in the range 1,650 to 2,000 posts approximately. This estimate will be refined as the project is implemented.

Experience of the trial programme for the local office microcomputer programme has reinforced our view that there are substantial benefits to be gained from the trial implementation in a small number of offices of major projects affecting the work of local offices.

Local Office Project

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if, pursuant to the answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 212-13, he will give details of the review of the overall planning of the local office project; if he will give reasons for each of the changes arising from the review; and if he will make a statement on the implications of the changes for the time scale of hardware procurement for the overall cost of the projects, and the anticipated savings to arise from its implementation;

(2) what is his latest estimate of the total costs of (a) the whole local office computer project and (b) the first stage facilities of the project; what is the current value of orders for hardware for the first stage facilities; when the first hardware is now expected to be delivered; and how this compares with the original estimate for such deliveries;

(3) what is his latest estimate of the financial and staff savings, respectively, expected to arise from the first stage of the local office computer project; how these compare with his original estimates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The review resulted in a change only to the sequence of implementation of the various phases of the project. It concluded that the introduction of facilities for the assessment, calculation and payment of supplementary benefit in the first phase would lead to a more efficient system, would reduce disruption in local offices and would give better value for money than the original plan. The change did not, in itself, have any significant implications for the time scale of the major hardware procurement, although first deliveries will be later than expected.

It is estimated that the total cost of the project, up to April 1999, will be approximately £418 million, including capital, development and running costs. The costs of the first phase facilities have not been separately identified. No orders have yet been placed for hardware, the first of which will, it is expected, be delivered early in 1987. It is not possible, at this stage of project development, accurately to assess financial and staff savings. For the purposes of assessing the potential value of the project it has been estimated that staff savings will be of the order of 8,400 in a full year from the project as a whole. On that basis, over the costing period described above, it is estimated that gross financial savings will be of the order of £777 million. No valid comparison can be drawn with original estimates; they assumed a different approach to implementation.

Private Patients (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether control weaknesses have been found in all health authorities for which reports were issued following investigations by his Department audit staff in relation to the payment of private patient charges; and if the accounts of all such authorities have been qualified;

(2) whether control weaknesses have been found in all health authorities investigated by his Department's audit staff in relation to the payment of private patient charges; and if the accounts of all health authorities have been qualified;

(3) if he will list the health authorities for which reports have been issued following investigation by his Department's audit staff in relation to the payment of private patient charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We asked the statutory auditors to carry out a special review in May 1984 of the handling of private patient charges at 37 health authorities. The auditors identified material control weaknesses in, and, accordingly, issued reports in respect of, the 21 health authorities listed. The auditors did not qualify their certificates to the 1983-84 accounts of all of these authorities:

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the health authorities for which statutory auditors have issued reports of poor control over private patient income in their routine examination of accounts.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Following their routine examination of the accounts of health authorities for 1983-84 and for 1984-85 (which is not yet complete) statutory auditors have issued reports of poor control over private patient income at the following 13 health authorities:

Health Authorities (Uncollected Income)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the health authorities where estimates of annual income uncollected have been given by statutory auditors, giving the estimate for each health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In their reports on the audit of the accounts of health authorities for 1983-84 statutory auditors gave estimates of income uncollected. However, these figures do not cover income in respect of private patients alone. They also include income from other unrelated non-NHS activities and due under the Road Traffic Acts. The estimates were as follows:

Bradford DHA	5,500
Darlington DHA	20,000

Harefield Hospital Heart Transplant Fund

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether payments by foreign nationals into the Harefield hospital heart transplant fund are fixed so as to cover the costs of the operation in question.

(2) what are the main sources of income and items of expenditure of the Harefield hospital heart transplant fund in the last year for which figures are available;

(3) by whose authority Harefield hospital carries out operations on foreign nationals in exchange for payments, fixed by the hospital, into the Harefield hospital heart transplant fund;

(4) whether the heart-lung transplant performed at Harefield hospital on Brooke Matthews was subject to the charges for services provided for overseas visitors set out in his Department's circular HC(85)14.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Overseas patients who receive heart transplant surgery at Harefield hospital are asked to make a deposit to cover the expected full cost of their treatment and aftercare. In addition to the statutory charges made under section 65(2) of the National Health Service Act 1977, a donation is also requested to bring the total deposit up to the sum which the hospital calculates should cover the full cost of treatment for each procedure.

This additional donation reflects the very high cost of the treatment compared to the charge and includes a substantial element in lieu of professional fees. If after the event it is found that the deposit does not reflect the final cost, adjustments may be made.

The donation is made to the Harefield hospital heart transplant fund which in turn reimburses the health authority. These arrangements would not apply to European Community nationals referred for treatment under the provisions of the European Community Social Services Regulations, the terms of which require that patients accepted for treatment must be regarded as ordinary National Health Service patients. The arrangements were followed in the case of Brooke Matthews.

The Harefield hospital transplant fund is an independent charitable trust set up to support and further research and development of the heart transplant programme. Our Department has no responsibility to oversee the trust's finances. However, I understand that in the current financial year the trust will donate up to a further £100,000 towards the programme's general nursing and equipment costs, with the emphasis on research and development.

Opticians

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the number of (a) ophthalmic opticians and (b) dispensing opticians in independent practice in each year since 1978;

(2) if he will list the number of enrolled bodies corporate practising as (a) ophthalmic opticians and (b) dispensing opticians in each year since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have information in the form requested. The following table shows the numbers of opticians and enrolled bodies corporate registered with the General Optical Council and the number of practices providing services under the NHS general ophthalmic services. We do not have information about the numbers in other forms of practice.

Chrysoidine Dye

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet received the medical advice concerning the relationship between chrysoidine dye and urothelial cancer that he called for upon receiving the special case control study by Birmingham researchers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A sub-group of the Committee on the Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment has considered this study. We are still awaiting its advice.

NHS (Expenditure)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on each person resident in England in respect of National Health Service funding to England in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: National Health Service spending per head of population in England for the years 1980-81 to 1984-85 is as follows:

1980-81	213
1981-82	238
1982-83	260
1983-84	275
1984-85	*295

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to how many people do not receive a proportionate pension for service on retirement, due to a change of employment during their career;

(2) what information he has as to the percentage of the pensionable population who do not receive a proportionate pension for service on retirement owing to a change in employment during their career.

Mr. Whitney: Details of the number of people who do not receive a proportionate pension for service on retirement due to a change of employment during their career are not available. In his 1979 survey of occupational pensions schemes, the Government Actuary estimated an annual turnover of some 1 million scheme members, which is equivalent to about 10 per cent.

The effect on eventual pension of people who change employment depends on the rules of the individual pension scheme. However, we accept that people who change jobs often lose in terms of their pension. That is why we have taken steps in the Social Security Bill to require schemes to revalue preserved pensions for future early leavers in line with prices up to 5 per cent. a year compound. We are also giving future early leavers the right to take a transfer if they prefer that to a preserved pension.

Dietary Diseases

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has received the results of the studies into the incidence of anorexia nervosa and bulimia conducted at Leeds and Edinburgh universities; and what guidance his Department issues about encouraging better balanced dietary behaviour to avoid these conditions;

(2) when he expects to make a substantive reply to the question of the hon. Member for Harrow, East about the results of studies into the incidence of anorexia nervosa and bulimia conducted at Leeds and Edinburgh universities and guidance by his Department about encouraging better-balanced dietary behaviour to avoid these conditions.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 55]: I am not sure which of the various studies of these conditions my hon. Friend has in mind. He may wish to let me have details. We have taken steps to encourage sensible eating habits, through the Health Education Council and by other means, and we are happy to consider any proposals for steps to prevent anorexia nervosa and bulimia — morbid conditions in which sufferers find themselves unable to eat sensibly.

Ressetlement Units

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many residents of his Department's resettlement units have been discharged from a mental hospital in each year since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: It is not possible to obtain this information for the period January 1979 to February 1982 as some of the relevant papers have been destroyed as a matter of routine. The remaining information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what financial support has been given by his Department to each of his Department's resettlement units during the past two years.

Mr. Whitney: The gross amount of financial support given by the Department to each of its resettlement units and combined resettlement unit/re-establishment centres for the past two years is given in the table.

Alvaston near Derby	371,200	388,000

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will allocate additional resources to local authorities to enable suitable alternative provisions to be made for those citizens who reside in his Department's resettlement units after the proposed closure.

Mr. Whitney: The regional reviews presently being undertaken involve consultation not only with voluntary organisations but with local authorities and will consider the replacement provision in the light of their findings in a particular area. The review teams will consider proposals coming forward from both the voluntary sector and local authorities before making their recommendations. Details of funding arrangements cannot be finalised until the reports by the regional review teams have been completed.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of citizens who have been accommodated in resettlement units administered by his Department since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Service Commissioner (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that the cases of complaints of ill-treatment to elderly and physically and mentally-handicapped patients mentioned in the annual report of the Health Service Commissioner are thoroughly investigated.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pay Awards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the contributions which have been made by his Department in each year since 1979 towards doctors' and nurses' annual pay awards.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what methods he is presently examining for linking pay awarded to general practitioners with the quality of their performance and their services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are examining the structure of general practitioners' remuneration, but are not yet ready to put forward proposals.

Family Doctors (Services)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to give assistance to the Royal College of General Practitioners in determining proposals to improve the quality of family doctors' services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We welcome the Royal College's constructive contribution to public discussion about the future arrangements for general practice. I am meeting representatives of the Royal College to discuss their ideas tomorrow.

Hospital Services (Privatisation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to invite chairmen of district and regional health authorities to discuss with him the effects which privatisation and contracting-out of hospital services have had on National Health Service manpower levels.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 23 May, at columns 544-45.

Great Ormond Street Hospital

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to reply to the question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about the cardiac block at Great Ormond Street hospital for sick children, originally down for answer on 27 June.

Mr. John Patten: I hope to reply to the hon. Member later this week.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will state the estimated savings he expects in the first full year of operation from changes in the board and lodging regulations as they affect mentally handicapped people (a) in total, (b) for Scotland and (c) for Edinburgh;

(2) if he will estimate how much money will be saved in the first full year of operation from changes in the board and lodging regulations as they affect mentally handicapped people, as a result of (a) changes in the maximum rents that can be charged, (b) abolishing the disability allowance for private nursing homes and residential care homes, (c) deducting the attendance allowances from claimants in nursing homes and residential care homes and (d) reducing the personal allowance from £10·30 to £8·50 a week for new claimants and freezing current personal allowances at £10·30 until the £8·50 is updated to match it.

Mr. Whitney: Estimates of savings in respect of the changes in the board and lodging regulations as they affect mentally handicapped people are not available separately.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from those concerned about changes in the board and lodging regulations as they affect the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a number of representations from individuals and organisations, including Mencap, Mind, United Response, Care and The Enterprise Foundation for People with Mental Handicap.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received to date expressing concern at the new board and lodging allowances.

Mr. Whitney: Since 29 April we have received about 600 letters from hon. Members and about 800 letters direct from individuals and organisations on the board and lodging changes.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people who, since the introduction of the revised board and lodging regulations, have been obliged to leave board and lodgings and have subsequently not been able to obtain any other form of shelter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have no evidence that claimants affected by the expiry of time limits on payment as boarders have been unable to make alternative arrangements to receive supplementary benefit as householders or non-householders or to obtain payment as boarders in other areas.

Occupational Deafness Benefit

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if employees in any occupation other than those listed in Leaflet NI207, "Occupational Deafness," are eligible for occupational deafness benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton Leaflet NI207 lists all occupations covered by prescribed disease A10 "occupational deafness". A person may also qualify for industrial disablement benefit if deafness is caused by an accident at work.

Civil Servants (Ministerial Briefings)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what basis he selects the officials to brief him on particular topics; whether there are any civil servants specifically and personally debarred from briefing him on any matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: Meetings, whether for briefing or any other purpose, are held with those officials most appropriate to the meeting's purpose. There are no other considerations.

Health Authorities (Property Sales)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list in the Official Report which mental hospitals have been sold during the last five years; and what was the total amount received by his Department;

(2) how much of the hospital land sold by regional health authorities during the last five years was in the green belt.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has issued to regional health authorities concerning the use of money received by them from the sale of buildings or land formerly used for the care of mentally ill or handicapped patients who have been discharged into the community.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 12 July, at columns 566-67.

Central Bridging Fund

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total amount available in the central bridging fund.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I explained quite clearly in the debate on 11 July at columns 1374-75, why I see no clear case for a central bridging fund at the moment. Indeed, I am not sure that the Select Committee had thought through in detail its proposals for such a fund in its latest report. However, I accept that Government and regional health authorities must continue to ensure that bridging finance for capital and revenue is made available for well planned local proposals to replace outdated hospital-based care for mentally ill, mentally handicapped or the very elderly patients with better community-based services.

I have undertaken on many occasions to consider very carefully any applications for bridging finance from central funds if any such application is ever put to me by a health authority.

Schizophrenic Patients

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he has given to regional health authorities about facilities to be provided for the treatment of schizophrenic patients after the closure of long-stay mental hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are well aware that there is a continuing need for long-term inpatient care for some patients, including some schizophrenic patients. Our policy paper, "Mental Illness: Policies for Prevention, Treatment, Rehabilitation and Care", says on this:

> "Plans will be needed for suitable accommodation such as a hospital hostel along the lines discussed in the 1975 White Paper (para 4.54). DHSS has information on current studies in this field."

But the majority of people with schizophrenia already live at home, often with support from the psychiatric services (including admissions when necessary). We are anxious to improve the network of support for such people, and one of the projects in our "Helping the Community to Care" initiative is directed specifically to the need of people with schizophrenia.

We have made it clear to health authorities that we regard it as urgent, irrespective of closure plans, that all districts should develop a local service offering both "hospital" and "non-hospital" care. The closure of some large mental illness hospitals will follow the build-up of local services.

Drug (Research Guidelines)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has made to the approach by the British Medical Association to his Department about its proposals to set up an independent national committee to provide ethical guidelines for research ranging from drug trials to tests of techniques and treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our officials have met the British Medical Association informally to discuss these proposals. We have asked to be informed of the progress of the association's wider consultations with interested bodies.

Social Work (Emergency Cover)

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report those social services authorities which do not provide emergency social work cover at weekends.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not collected centrally.

Gas Cookers

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the practice of his Department in advising claimants concerning the purchase of secondhand gas cookers when providing single payments to them.

Mr. Whitney: Claimants are advised in accordance with paragraphs 7214-7215 of the S manual, a copy of which is in the Library. They are normally told the level of expenditure considered reasonable and asked to produce a supplier's estimate of the cost of the item they have located. They are also advised to obtain an appliance that has been checked and to have it installed by a suitably qualified person (for example, the gas board or an installer registered with the Confederation for Registration of Gas Installers).

Social Fund

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which single payments currently payable under the supplementary benefit scheme will be met by the social fund by means of (a) grant or (b) loans for; clothing and footwear, baby items/bedding, furniture and household equipment, hire purchase debt for furniture and household goods, removal expenses, house repairs, redecoration, returnable deposit for accommodation, rent in advance, legal fees for renewal of a lease, survey fees, irregular housing costs, gardening costs, costs associated with seeking and starting work, fares to visit a relative in hospital or a home or in a domestic crisis or to visit a child when custody has not been decided, fuel debts, heating appliances, draught-proofing, hot water cylinder jackets, slot meter and reconnection charges, and payments where a claimant has been underpaid or to replace money spent from weekly living expenses.

Mr. Newton: The proposals for the social fund, as outlined in chapter 2, volume 2 of the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security", imply a different approach to help with special needs from the present single payments system as categorised by the hon. Member. We shall be giving further consideration to the circumstances where payments might be made from the social fund in the light of consultations on the Green Paper.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many two-parent families he estimates would be eligible to claim family income supplement if the number of qualifying hours were reduced from 30 hours to 24 hours;

(2) what he estimates would be the effect on the number of eligible claimants for family income supplement of reducing the number of qualifying hours from 30 to 24.

Mr. Whitney: One-parent families may qualify for family income supplement at present on the basis of remunerative work involving at least 24 hours weekly. If the qualifying hours for two-parent families were to be reduced from 30 hours to 24 hours weekly, we estimate that the number of families eligible for FIS would be increased by less than 10,000.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if exceptionally severe weather payments are to be abolished as a result of his social security reviews;

(2) what new arrangements he proposes to make for the calculation of exceptionally severe weather and payments to assist with heating bills in such weather for 1985-86.

Mr. Whitney: As I made clear to the House on 12 March, at columns 129-31, the present arrangements are under review and we shall announce our conclusions before next winter.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was paid out in exceptionally severe weather payments in 1984-85; and how many claimants benefited.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Support Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services at what level of income support benefit will be payable to the families of those involved in trade disputes following the abolition of the non-householder supplementary benefit scale rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We shall be giving further consideration to the implications of the proposed income support structure for the benefit position of those involved in a trade dispute.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many housing benefit recipients receive less than £11 per week for (a) rent and rates and (b) rent only; and what proportion these people are of the total number of housing benefit recipients;

(2) what number and proportion of housing benefit recipients receive below £1, £1-2, £2-3, £3-4, £4-5, £5-6, £6-7, £7-8, £8-9 and £10-11 per week respectively and what are their average earnings.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 10 June 1985, c. 366]: The information requested is estimated in the table.

The estimates for standard cases have been based on family expenditure survey data which have been updated and then adjusted to reflect the current global case load and expenditure levels indicated by local authority subsidy claims. All the estimates are subject to error, the individual breakdowns should therefore be treated as orders of magnitude only.

Notes:

1. The estimate for standard cases relates to November 1984 but is based on family expenditure survey data for earlier years; that for certificated cases to December 1984.
2. The figures for average weekly income cover income from all sources including state benefits and savings, as many standard cases are not earners.
3. In all cases the percentages relate to the total number of recipients in that particular category.
4. Individual items do not necessarily add up to totals because of rounding. All figures should be treated as indicative estimates only.

Chiropody

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the estimated cost of offering free chiropody services to one-armed war pensioners;

(2) if he will introduce free chiropody services for one-armed war pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 56-57]: Chiropody is already available free under the National Health Service and all disabled people are given priority. We are considering the case for providing private chiropody for war pensioner arm amputees when their need for treatment cannot be met through the National Health Service. The cost of doing so is estimated to be in the region of £31,000.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Hamsam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for each district health authority and for each regional health authority, what is the number of young people between the ages of 16 and 19 years living in long-stay mental handicap hospitals; and for each authority what is the number living in units of (a) 25 or more beds, (b) under 25 beds;

(2) for each district health authority and for each regional health authority what is the number of children in long-stay mental handicap hospitals; and for each authority what is the number living in units of (a) 25 or more beds, (b) under 25 beds.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, for each district health authority and each regional health authority, what is the number of children on short-term placements in long-stay mental handicap hospitals; and for each authority what is the number in units of (a) 25 or more beds and (b) under 25 beds.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 374]: The table shows numbers of children and young people in mental handicap hospitals and units at 31 December 1983. They include those in small National Health Service units in the community, and those in slightly larger specialist local units for children and young people. The figures also include children and young people admitted for a few weeks, or an even shorter period, for short-term care or assessment; and those who spend part of their time at home and part in National Health Service care. Separate figures are not available centrally for these separate categories.

The table gives numbers of young people aged 16-18 which are the nearest available figures to the 16-19 age range requested. The Department's annual publication "Inpatient statistics from the mental health enquiry for England", copies of which are in the Library, does include national figures for residents by age and certain durations of stay.

Social Security Review

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will expand on the description of claimants who have no recent links with the United Kingdom given in paragraph 2.87 of Cmnd. 9518;

(2) whether the presence test mentioned in paragraph 2.87 of the Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security", Cmnd. 9518, will exclude claimants who have gone abroad for long periods to visit or care for relatives;

(3) whether the presence test mentioned in paragraph 2.87 of the Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security", Cmnd. 9518, will include a reference to a claimant's immigration status.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985, c. 535]: We are considering the details of the proposed presence test. In doing so we shall have regard to the characteristics of the tests which operate already for benefits such as child benefit, attendance allowance and mobility allowance, and how these tests apply to particular groups of beneficiaries.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that no treatment to kidney patients on dialysis or for kidney transplants are denied medication on the ground of cost; if he will indicate the steps he has taken to reduce the cost of proprietary drugs; if he will give the names of the drugs concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985]: It is for health authorities, on the advice of patients' clinicians, to decide which medication is to be made available. We do not control the initial pricing of drugs when launched, but subsequent price changes are governed by the extent of the manufacturer's allowed profitability on sales of medicines to the National Health Service under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. I understand that Sandoz Products Limited, the manufacturer of cyclosporin, a drug used extensively in the treatment of patients who have received an organ transplant, have stated that it does not intend to apply for departmental approval to increase the price of this product during 1985.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of kidney patients awaiting transplants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985]: The number of renal patients in the United Kingdom registered at the United Kingdom transplant service as awaiting a kidney transplant on 30 June 1985 was 3,043. Virtually all of these patients will already be receiving dialysis. Numbers continue to rise despite record numbers of kidney transplant operations performed in 1983 and 1984, since more renal patients have been accepted for treatment by dialysis, and as improvements in surgical and immunosuppressive techniques have meant that more renal patients can be referred as suitable for transplantation. There is a pressing need for more kidneys for transplantation, and the Government are grateful to all those who are helping to publicise this need at present.

Kidney Donors

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is considering additional action, apart from the current campaign, to increase the number of kidney donors; if he will indicate the current supply of kidney organs and the possible expansion of the supply of such organs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 19 July 1985]: New initiatives to promote the organ donor card and to increase the number of donor organs becoming available for transplantation are being taken all the time; for example, several of the major clearing banks and building societies have recently agreed to display posters and dispense cards.

I am advised that on certain occasions a constraining factor may be the reluctance of some doctors to initiate donation procedures, and the Chief Medical Officer has recently written to the directors of renal transplant units asking them to review their relationships with those hospital departments within their catchment areas which are most likely to have potential organ donors.

The number of kidney transplant operations performed in the United Kingdom during the first six months of this year, according to provisional data supplied by the United Kingdom Transplant Service, was 643, and our efforts to increase the supply of donor kidneys are continuing.

THE ARTS

Exhibitions (Insurance)

Mr. Latham asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what progress has been made in the discussions between the Minister for the Arts and the chairman of the trustees of the Tate Gallery regarding the difference of interpretation over the indemnity insurance provisions for exhibitions on loan from national collections; and whether the Minister has received any assurances that the Tate Gallery will permit the Kessler collection to be exhibited in Leicester shortly.

Mr. Waldegrave: My noble Friend the Minister for the Arts is consulting the chairman of the trustees of the Tate Gallery on this matter. He hopes that it will swiftly be resolved.

CIVIL SERVICE

Private Security Companies (Contracts)

Mr. Dubs asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list all the current contracts between Government Departments and private security companies.

Mr. Hayhoe: This information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Business Appointments

Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is the practice of his Department in applying to admirals of the Fleet, field marshals and marshals of the Royal Air Force, who remain on the active list, the rule that Crown servants are free to accept certain business appointments without official permission two years after their retirement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Admirals of the Fleet, field marshals and marshals of the Royal Air Force are subject to the rules governing the acceptance of outside appointments in the same way as other Crown servants to whom the rules apply. Whilst they remain on the active list and for two years after their names are removed from that list, they are required to seek the Government's approval before taking up any outside appointments.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Orange Marches

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from Mr. Tom Walsh of the Gaelic Athletic Association concerning Orangemen marches in Catholic areas in the Province; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I received a letter from Mr. Walsh on 10 July. I also received copies of it from two hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry). My private secretary will be writing to Mr. Walsh shortly and I shall arrange for both hon. Members to receive a copy of the reply.

Down Royal Racecourse

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been paid from the horse racing fund to Down Royal racecourse in each of the last five years.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

1980-81	28,490
1981-82	41,080
1982-83	24,875
1983-84	22,340
1984-85	70,000

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what has been the amount of grant aid paid to Down Royal racecourse by the Department of Agriculture in each of the last five years;

(2) to what extent the Department of Agriculture has grant aided prize money for Down Royal racecourse in each of the last five years.

Dr. Boyson: The Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland has paid grant aid to Down Royal racecourse as follows:

1980-81	49,050
1981-82	50,410
1982-83	5,485
1983-84	1,925
1984-85	95,810

Of this, £39,945 in 1984-85 was towards prize money.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the current tax cost in mortgage interest relief of each 1 per cent. increase in interest rates.

Mr. Moore: The direct revenue cost of mortgage interest relief from a 1 percentage point increase in mortgage interest rates would be about £350 million at current levels of lending, if the increase were to apply for a full year.

Rates

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the figures showing domestic rate payments as a percentage of personal disposable income in (a) the latest year for which figures are available, (b) five years earlier and (c) 10 years earlier.

Mr. Peter Rees: Estimates of domestic rate payments net of rate rebates in the United Kingdom as a proportion of total personal disposable income are as follows for the financial years 1974-75, 1979-80, 1984-85:

	Per cent.
1974-75	1·9
1979-80	2·0
1984-85	2·3

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the figures showing rates as a proportion of total taxation in (a) the latest year for which figures are available, (b) five years earlier and (c) 10 years earlier.

Mr. Peter Rees: Local authority rates as a proportion of total general Government taxation (including national insurance, and so on, contributions) was as follows:

	Per cent.
1974-75	10·2
1979-80	9·6
1984-85*	10·5

*Provisional.

Capital Goods Exports

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he proposes to consult the financial community on mechanisms for providing soft loans for capital goods exports; and what time scale is envisaged.

Mr. Peter Rees: Consultations between officials of various Departments and the Bank of England and representatives of the financial community, are now taking place.

Infrastructure

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about increased spending on the infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees: Several.

Tax Allowance

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the level of single transferable tax allowance which could be funded in 1985-86 on a revenue neutral basis, assuming separate taxation of investment as well as earned income, abolition of wife's earned income allowance, of the age allowance and of the additional person allowance, and that the category B wife's pension would be taxed as belonging to the wife.

Mr. Moore: The resulting fully transferable personal allowance would be about £2,260.

Personal Allowance

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated cost in the present financial year of the additional personal allowance.

Mr. Moore: The estimated direct revenue cost of the additional personal allowance is £150 million at 1985-86 levels of income.

Sterling Divergence

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his written reply dated 5 July concerning the exchange rate between the £ sterling and the ecu, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each month since March 1983 the average movement of the sterling divergence indicators.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is in the table:

£ divergence indicator—monthly averages since March 1983*

	1983	1984	1985
January		−147	321
February		−90	276
March	425	30	146
April	−236	61	−19
May	−218	−3	−76
June	−101	49	−121
July	−100	73
August	−174	31
September	−150	21

£ divergence indicator—monthly averages since March 1983*

	1983	1984	1985
October	−78	97
November	−146	130
December	−124	178

* The divergence indicator is calculated by expressing the ecu's premium or discount against sterling (that is the percentage deviation of sterling's market ecu rate from its notional central rate) as a percentage of sterling's maximum divergence spread (ie 1·91 per cent.) if it were a normal member of the mechanism.

Building Societies

Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received in connection with the publication of the Green Paper, "Building Societies: A New Framework", concerning the practice of certain building societies of making advances out of their funds for purposes not connected with house purchase or home improvement; and if he will make it his policy to include in his proposed new legislation a code of practice to ensure fair competition for any extension of building society powers;

(2) what representations he has received in connection with the publication of the Green Paper, "Building Societies: A New Framework", concerning the evidence that building societies obtain from borrowers that loans made by means of a second charge are for home improvement or purposes reasonably incidental to it; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that his proposed new legislation will include a requirement for societies to satisfy the Inland Revenue that loans qualifying for tax relief under MIRAS are for mortgages of freehold or leasehold estate and home improvement purposes only.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have received a number of representations about building societies lending for purposes other than house purchase or improvement. The Government have announced that they intend to bring the treatment of lending institutions under the Consumer Credit Act into line, but a final decision on how best to achieve this has not yet been taken.

There have also been some representations on the evidence societies obtain on the purpose of loans. Loans are eligible for tax relief under MIRAS only if made for purchase or improvement of the main residence of the borrower (or his divorced or separated spouse or dependent relative or if they are made to a person over 65 for the purchase of a life annuity secured on his main residence). The borrower is already required under existing law to certify that his loan meets the conditions for tax relief.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present pension of a person who retired from (a) local government and (b) other sectors of public service immediately after the index-linked pension system became operative whose salary at that time was £3,000, £4,000, £5,000, £6,000, £7,000 and £10,000 respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: Since the size of a pension depends not only on final salary but on length of service it is not possible to answer the question as put. However, the annual pension of a public servant who retired on 27 July 1971, the date of Royal Assent of the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971, would now be roughly 4½ times larger in cash terms than when it was first awarded.

For example, a local government officer who retired in July 1971 on a salary of £3,000 after a full career of 40 years' service would have received an original pension of £1,500 and would now be receiving a pension of £6,860. If his pensionable service had been, say, 20 years, his original pension would have been £750 and would now be £3,430. The comparable figures where the final salary was £10,000 would, for an individual with 40 years' service, be £5,000 in 1971 and £22,860 now; and for the individual with 20 years' service, £2,500 in 1971 and £11,430 now.

The position for civil servants, NHS staff, teachers and members of the armed forces would be broadly the same as for local government staff. The pension of police and firemen would also be broadly the same assuming that they exercised the option of commuting a quarter of their pension into a lump sum.

Deeds of Covenant

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated cost in 1985-86 of the tax relief on (a) charitable deeds of covenant and (b) non-charitable deeds of covenant.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Nationalised Industries (Annual Reports)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which nationalised industries present their annual accounts on a current cost basis and which on an historic cost basis; and whether it is his policy to secure a greater degree of uniformity.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

European Monetary System

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what change in circumstances triggers a change in the central rate of currencies forming the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Exchange market pressures requiring an adjustment of central rates can stem from a number of sources. These include, in particular, the degree of convergence of economic performance and policies as regards inflation.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the central rate of the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system (a) in September 1984 and (b) currently; and what change has taken place in the £ sterling's relationship to it in that period.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 July 1985, at column 174.

Early-leavers Entitlements

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to introduce fiscal incentives to encourage pension organisations to preserve and revalue early-leaver entitlements.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much revenue is lost by (a) wife's earnings election and (b) wife's earnings allowance;

(2) what would be the estimated cost to the Exchequer of raising the married and single personal allowances to £4,500 and £2,250, respectively; and how much of this would represent a parallel increase in the wife's earnings allowance.

(3) how much revenue is raised through income tax on the difference between the relevant personal allowance and (a) £4,500 for a married person and (b) £2,250 for a single person.

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated cost of wife's earnings allowance by tax unit income bands in the current financial year.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what revenue is brought in by value added tax and stamp duty on the various transactions involved in buying and selling houses and other living accommodation.

Mr. Hayhoe: The stamp duty on residential property is estimated to have raised £290 million in 1984-85. I regret that a meaningful estimate of theVAT on such transactions cannot be given.

Average Earnings

Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many income tax payers there are who are on average or below average earnings.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Torney asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the role played by Mr. Michael Hepker, chairman of Sumrie Clothes, Leeds in the events leading to the collapse of the Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the role played by Mr. Michael Hepker, chairman of Sumrie Clothes plc, Leeds, in the events leading up to the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Members have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Files

Mr. Madden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the repository of files from Bradford tax districts is being moved from Bradford to Leeds; what type of accommodation is required for storing files; how many premises in Bradford were considered; when the repository in Leeds will open; whether it is intended that this facility will be used permanently; how long a repository for tax files has been located in Bradford; what manpower implications result from re-locating the repository in Leeds; and what is the cost of establishing the repository in Leeds.

Mr. Moore: The Bradford repository, used since 1970, has a number of unsatisfactory features, including asbestos problems. The files will be moved permanently to an ideally suitable and readily available light industrial Crown building in Leeds in March 1986. It is therefore unnecessary to consider alternative accommodation in Bradford. Six jobs will go to Leeds. The cost of establishing the Leeds repository will be around £575,000.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's latest policy on public expenditure on the social, welfare, housing services and the infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1985, c. 150]: It remains the Government's policy to direct resources, within the overall spending totals, taking account of their priorities and commitments and the effectiveness with which they are used.

North Sea Oil Revenue

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total contribution of yields from North sea oil to the United Kingdom's gross domestic product in each financial year since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1985, c. 150]: The information is set out in the table.

Contribution of North sea oil and gas to GDP

	£ billion 1980
1979-80	8·9
1980-81	9·1
1981-82	9·9
1982-83	11·5
1983-84	12·5
1984-85	13·1

TRANSPORT

Bus Services

7. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to increase central grants to local authority transport services, following the Government's response to the Transport Committee report on buses.

Mr. Ridley: No.

27. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about his response to the Transport Committee's report on buses; and if he will make a statement.

35. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received about the response to the Transport Committee's report on buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: To date I have received only one representation about the Government's response to the Transport Committee's report on the White Paper "Buses".

London Regional Transport

12. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has received from London Regional Transport for reductions in the scale of the London underground network.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received no such proposals.

Rail Engineering Works (Swindon)

14. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the implications for his rail policy of the proposed closure of the British Rail engineering works at Swindon.

Mr. Ridley: I have received 26 representations from those personally affected.

Severn Crossing

16. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the latest progress of the feasibility study into the building of a second Severn crossing.

Mrs. Chalker: Detailed work is in hand and consultations are being held on the options for the two corridors about which my right hon. Friend informed the House on 1 April 1985. We expect the study to be completed by the target date of August 1986.

St. Pancras-Sheffield Line

17. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to discuss the timekeeping of trains on the St. Pancras-Sheffield line with the chairman of the British Railways Board.

Mr. David Mitchell: Responsibility for the punctuality of services on individual lines lies with the British Rail. However, my right hon. Friend and the chairman have discussed train punctuality and the chairman has described the measures the board is taking to achieve the punctuality standards the board has set. If the hon. Member has a specific complaint about services on the line, I suggest he takes the matter up with the chairman in the first instance.

Roads (East Dorset)

18. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on road developments in east Dorset.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The only road in east Dorset for which I am responsible is the A31-A35 trunk road. In recent years we have provided bypasses along this road for Wimborne (1981) and Bere Regis (1982). Work is in progress on a bypass of Ferndown, and the recently published roads report lists four further schemes which are in preparation.

Transport Bill

19. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received on the Transport Bill; and of these, how many were in favour and how many against.

24. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received seeking changes in the provisions of the Transport Bill.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since the Transport Bill received its Second Reading in the House of Lords on 11 June, I have received around 400 representations the majority of which seek assurance or express anxiety about various aspects of the Bill. In most cases I hope my replies will have reassured those concerned.

M1 Repairs

20. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further repairs to the M1 motorway are expected during the second six months of the current year.

Mrs. Chalker: Four major renewal schemes are programmed to be carried out on the M1 in the second half of this year. One, the junction 8 scheme, finished on 11 July, five days ahead of schedule. The other three will be in Buckinghamshire, Leicestershire and South Yorkshire. There will in addition be minor repairs taking place from time to time.

33. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he made of the effect on traffic flows at junction 8 of the M1 in the first two weeks of July of his Department's recent publicity campaign regarding the repair works being carried out there.

Mrs. Chalker: The two-way traffic flow through junction 8 was reduced by over 40,000 vehicles per 16-hour day during the critical period of the works, undoubtedly as a result of our publicity campaign and the other measures adopted.

National Bus Company

21. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of the National Bus Company to discuss the future of the National Bus Company pension fund.

26. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of the National Bus Company to discuss the future of the National Bus Company pension fund.

Mr. Ridley: This was one of the matters I discussed with the chairman at our meeting on 11 June.

Basildon (Signposting)

22. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further progress there has been in the placing of road signs to Basildon on major roads throughout Essex and on the M25.

Mrs. Chalker: Specifications for signs to Basildon on the M25, the A127 and the A1089 trunk roads are now being prepared prior to their manufacture. I hope they will all be erected within the next three months.

Bus Services (Thurrock)

23. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the likely effects of the possible deregulation of bus services in Thurrock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have made no specific assessment of the effects of deregulation in Thurrock, but I have no reason to doubt that competition will benefit bus passengers in Thurrock as it will elsewhere in the country.

Roads (Maintenance)

25. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will withdraw the code of practice for the maintenance of trunk roads and motorways issued by his Department earlier this year.

Mrs. Chalker: No. The introduction of the code of practice is an important step towards obtaining consistent and safe maintenance standards and best value from the funds available for routine maintenance on the national road network. Improvements to the code will be made as experience is gained.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), intends to reply to the letter to her from the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, dated 20 May, regarding the code of practice for routine maintenance of motorways and all purpose trunk roads.

Mrs. Chalker: I have written to my hon. Friend today.

Tyne and Wear Metro

28. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his officials have yet met representatives of the Tyne and Wear county council to discuss the metro, following his undertaking to that effect to the Transport Committee.

Mr. David Mitchell: Discussions between officials of my Department and those of Tyne and Wear Passenger Transport Executive are continuing.

Blackwater Valley Route

29. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to designate the Blackwater Valley route a trunk road.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no plans to intervene in the preparation of this scheme by Hampshire and Surrey county councils.

Channel Tunnel (Rail Links)

30. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with European Transport Ministers on high speed rail links through a possible Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: In discussions with the French Transport Minister, Monsieur Auroux, in connection with the Channel fixed link I have made it clear that, while through rail links are primarily a question for negotiation between the railway administrations concerned and the promoters of the fixed link,. I would welcome any commercially viable arrangement which could be reached.

British Rail (Purchasing Policy)

31. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise the subject of British Rail's purchasing policies.

Mr. David Mitchell: I meet the chairman of British Rail regularly to discuss a wide range of matters of mutual interest, including the board's purchasing policy when appropriate.

British Airports Authority (Stansted Airport)

32. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has held any discussions with the British Airports Authority about extending its powers to purchase property severely affected by his decision to allow the expansion of Stansted airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The BAA's powers of acquisition are limited to land which is or might be needed for airport purposes. But once the BAA is reconstituted as a Companies Act company in preparation for privatisation it will be able to acquire properties by agreement with the owners without such restrictions. Moreover, as the White Paper on airports policy (Cmnd. 9542) states, the Government are considering whether owners of properties blighted by aircraft noise should be able to require an airport authority to purchase them.

European Road Safety Year

34. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for European Road Safety Year.

Mrs. Chalker: We shall use the year to highlight road safety initiatives in the field of legislation and research. Our publicity programme, and the efforts of other bodies, will be designed to increase public awareness of road safety problems in this country and abroad. We are still considering detailed possibilities, but I hope to increase our publicity efforts and in particular to encourage closer liaison between all the agencies involved and to bring in private sector sponsorship of road safety activities. Plans are also being developed in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Rail Engineering Industry

36. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received from staff at the Glasgow works of British Rail Engineering Limited concerning the future of the United Kingdom rail engineering industry.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since the beginning of the year we have received four letters about the future of BREL's Glasgow works, including one from an employee. Also, a group of BR and BREL trade unionists recently raised the matter with me. In each case I explained that this was a matter for management decision by BREL and the British Railways Board.

European Community (Cabotage)

37. Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport which European Economic Community countries, apart from the United Kingdom, allow competitive access to their coastal shipping, cabotage trades.

Mr. Ridley: Apart from the United Kingdom only Belgium, the Netherlands, the Republic of Ireland and, in practice, Denmark allow such access. This is a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs which I am pursuing urgently in bilateral discussions with EC Ministers. Discussions are also taking place within the Community on a proposal from the Commission which would have the effect of ensuring mutual competitive access to all member states' cabotage trades.

Rail Electrification (North Wales)

38. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any proposal from British Rail to electrify the north Wales main line, or any other connecting service to the west coast main line.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

British Rail (Investment)

39. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total authorised level of investment for British Rail over the next five years; and how this compares with the period 1974 to 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board's 1984 corporate plan includes a five-year investment programme from 1985-86 worth £2·2 billion (at 1984-85 prices). Individual schemes are authorised as they reach an appropriate stage. During the five years from 1974 to 1978 inclusive, BRB invested £903 million, which is equivalent to £2·08 billion at 1984-85 prices.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss future investment.

Mr. David Mitchell: I frequently meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Heavy Goods Vehicles (Operator's Licences)

40. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the rules for local residents raising objections to applications for heavy goods vehicles operator's licences.

Mrs. Chalker: Since the provisions allowing local residents to make representations about applications for goods vehicle operator licences came into effect in June 1984 we have received comments on various aspects of the system. As part of the review we are about to undertake of the way the provisions are working, we shall consider these comments and also seek the views of interested organisations.

Unlicensed Vehicles (Bromley)

41. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has made any assessment of the results of the campaign against unlicensed and abandoned vehicles in the London borough of Bromley, launched by his Department in collaboration with the Bromley borough council in April; how many cases of unlicensed vehicles were referred for prosecution during the period of the campaign; and how many vehicles were removed from the streets during the same period.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The campaign against unlicensed and abandoned vehicles in the London borough of Bromley resulted in the collection of more than £61,000 in additional voluntary relicensing. Reports on over 700 unlicensed or abandoned vehicles were received, 200 cases have so far been referred for prosecution, five cases are the subject of removal notices by the local authority and investigations into the remainder are continuing.

Driving Test

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate for the last five years the number taking the driving test at the Truro centre and the number passing; and what were the national average figures for the same period.

Mrs. Chalker: For Truro alone the only readily available information is that in the year 14 July 1984 to 6 July 1985, 4,114 tests were conducted and 2,143 candidates passed — a pass rate of 52 per cent. The following information relates to the western traffic area, in which Truro lies, and Great Britain.

Calendar Year	Western Traffic Area			Great Britain
	Tests Conducted	Number Passed	Per cent.	Tests Conducted	Number Passed	Per cent.
1980	135,155	68,299	50·53	1,962,034	927,795	47·29
1981	105,877	51,131	48·29	2,031,225	966,845	47·60
1982	138,554	69,632	50·26	2,005,296	965,036	48·12
1983	138,975	70,494	50·72	1,892,315	921,008	48·67
1984	140,327	71,276	50·79	1,784,112	875,432	49·07

Trinity House (Overseas Work)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the amount of work on behalf of Trinity House placed with overseas shipyards in the last three years; what information he has as to the reasons for such expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: On 15 July with the consent of my right hon. Friend, Trinity House signed a contract with Hyundai of Korea for the construction of a lighthouse tender at a total cost then estimated at £9·6 million. Hyundai's price was £5 million below the lowest UK bid, which far exceeded the support that could be offered from the shipbuilding intervention fund. The whole cost of the vessel falls on the general lighthouse fund, which is private money for which my right hon. Friend is publicly accountable. We decided it would be incompatible with our responsibility for the fund to secure less than the best value for money obtainable. Fifty-six per cent. of the value of the content of the vessel will be procured in the United Kingdom. With the exception of the contract with Hyundai, Trinity House has placed no work with overseas shipyards in the last three years.

Motorways (Surfaces)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has yet decided whether concrete or tar surfaces are most cost beneficial for use on motorways; and what are the reasons for this choice.

Mrs. Chalker: It is not possible to make a general decision on which material is the more cost beneficial. Either of these materials can give equally good performance, although their relative merits may depend on the particular requirements of the scheme in question. For those reasons the Department usually allows for a choice of design and accepts the lowest tender, whether it be for concrete or bituminous materials or a combination of the two. Design standards are revised and updated in the light of information on performance and the results of research and development.

M3 (Extension)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the public inquiry into the extension of the M3 motorway from Bar End to the Chilworth roundabout to be completed and the inspector's report to be available to him.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the inspector hopes to complete the inquiry early next month. The timing of the submission of the report is a matter for the inspector, but, on the basis of experience of other inquiries, I would hope to receive it within about three to six months of the close of the inquiry.

Air Travel Reserve Fund

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport what response he has received to the consultations on the future of the air travel reserve fund; and when he expects to announce his conclusions.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been very encouraged by the response. There is widespread support in favour of changes to the present arrangements for protecting air package holidaymakers. I hope to announce very shortly my conclusions on the consultations.

Vehicles (Roadworthiness)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what tests are done to ensure the roadworthiness of vehicles leaving the United Kingdom;

(2) what regulations govern the roadworthiness of coaches leaving the United Kingdom, the competence of the drivers and the safety of the passengers, over and above those required for driving in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: We do not impose special regulations or tests on vehicles or drivers leaving the United Kingdom, and know of no other country which does so.

Marques

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport why the vessel the Marques was given a load-line certificate of exemption by his Department without his Department surveying the vessel.

Mr. Ridley: Matters of this kind will be considered at the formal investigation into the loss of the Marques. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on them in advance.

Coach Drivers

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Transport what precautions are taken to ensure that foreign coach drivers are properly qualified and experienced to drive in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: The police and authorised officers of the Departmemt of Transport have powers to require production of drivers' licences. Drivers of coaches which temporarily enter the United Kingdom must hold the appropriate class of foreign licence or international driving permit.

Civil Actions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many cases of legal proceedings have been instituted by private citizens or by organisations against his Department in each single year since 1979; what was the nature of the cases which the plantiffs presented; and what proportion of them were ruled in favour of the plantiff by the appropriate judge.

Mr. Ridley: Legal proceedings have been instituted against the Department on a wide variety of subject matters, including claims for damages, challenges to administrative decisions, appeals against licensing decisions and references on matters of compensation, as well as many other topics. I therefore regret that the information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

London (Traffic Control)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how, in the light his Department's press notice 211, he proposes that the number of cars entering central London and traffic levels in inner London, including those on orbital routes such as the south circular, should be controlled.

Mrs. Chalker: As my speech quoted therein made clear, there is no easy answer to London's complex traffic problems, but a sensible balance between public and private transport is the right approach. Seeking to control traffic by fostering bad conditions and congestion is certainly not the right way forward. The importance of proper studies of environment and traffic in specific areas such as the south circular corridor is all the more vital with the changing traffic patterns as the M25 approaches completion.

Coastguard

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the level of provision of coastguard services around the coasts.

Mr. David Mitchell: Her Majesty's Coastguard's 10-year modernisation programme will be virtually complete with the opening in December this year of the new maritime rescue subcentre "Solent", at Lee-on-Solent. All 24 centres will then be fitted with the latest technology for the co-ordination of maritime search and rescue in close co-operation with the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, aircraft of the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force and British Telecom's coast radio stations.

This country now possesses the most comprehensive maritime and coastal search and rescue service anywhere outside the United States; and I would like to pay tribute to the skill and dedication of the Coastguard Service, which last year recorded 4,879 incidents, and co-ordinated assistance to 8,516 persons in danger at sea or on the coastline. In spite of their tremendous efforts, 257 lives were still lost.

It remains the responsibility of those on our coastline and in yachts and fishing vessels to exercise due care for their own safety. In particular, all boats should be encouraged to carry marine band VHF radio, which enables mariners to call the Coastguard for assistance, allowing the latter in any part of the United Kingdom to fix swiftly the position of a casualty by radio direction finding.

Lorry Bans

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the number of lorry bans applied by local authorities and the total number of miles of roads affected by such bans in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1985, c. 106]: Information is not available in the form requested.

The most recent survey carried out by the Department identified some 2,250 lorry controls that had been introduced by local authorities on amenity grounds. A list of schemes entitled "List of Lorry Control Schemes Made on Amenity Grounds" is in the Library, and I am putting a supplementary list in the Library in respect of the 143 schemes in operation in 1983 in Greater London.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if, pursuant to his statement of 12 July, Official Report, column 1451, he can now give more precise figures for the cost of Select Committees.

Mr. Biffen: In 1984-85 the identifiable costs of Select Committees were £600,000. This figure represents the costs of travel within the United Kingdom and abroad by Select Committees; of shorthand writers; witness expenses and salaries for specialist assistants. It does not include elements of expenditure which cannot be isolated, such as the salaries of the Clerks and the costs of using the facilities of the House; nor the compliance costs of Select Committees in Government Departments.

Houses of Parliament (Costs)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if, pursuant to his statement of 12 July, Official Report, column 1451, he can now give more precise figures for the cost of running Parliament between 1981-82 and 1984-85 and the rate of rise in the retail price index during the same period.

Mr. Biffen: The total identified costs for the Houses of Parliament, rose from £56·2 million in 1981-82 to £77·5 million in 1984-85. This represents a rise of 38 per cent. Between 1981-82 and 1984-85 the retail price index rose by 17·7 per cent.

St. Stephen's Club

Mr. Body asked the Lord Privy Seal what plans there are for the use of the former St. Stephen's club; and whether the matter is to be considered by the catering sub-committee.

Mr. Biffen: The former St. Stephen's club at No. 1 Bridge street is one of the buildings being considered by the new building sub-committee of the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) in its inquiry into the possible use and financing of phase II of the Bridge street development. I understand that discussions are continuing between the new building sub-committee and the property services agency and others, and that the catering sub-committee is being consulted as appropriate.

WALES

Rural Areas (Financial Assistance)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make available financial assistance to rural areas of Wales outside the locations covered by Mid Wales Development on similar lines to that available within that geographical area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have no plans to extend the coverage of the financial assistance currently provided by the Development Board for Rural Wales. Areas outside the responsibility of the board will continue to have support from other agencies.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider seeking to establish a separate new grant for rural areas in Wales on similar lines to the present urban aid scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am always ready to consider ways of sustaining the rural economy in Wales and am keeping the position under review.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will seek to amend the constitution of district health authorities in Wales to ensure that each district council has a representative on the health authority which covers its area.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. Members appointed by district councils are not intended to be representative of any particular district council as such, but should be appointed by the district councils in each district health authority area with due regard to members' expertise and experience.

ECSC (Loans)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made concerning the non-availability of low-interest European Coal and Steel Community loans for industrial development in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Representations have been made to the Commission of the European Communities about the suspension of new ECSC loans business and I am awaiting the outcome of urgent discussions now in progress.

Agricultural Organisation Society

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been paid to the Wales Agricultural Organisation Society in each of the last five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Grants paid to the Welsh Agricultural Organisation Society in each of the past five years are listed. Currently these funds represent about 40 per cent. of the society's total expenditure, the remainder coming from members' subscriptions, fees and miscellaneous income.

Year ended 31 March	£
1980-81	76,020
1981-82	85,776
1982-83	96,000
1983-84	85,000
1984-85	89,250

Note: Funds were advanced under an Agency agreement with the Central Council for Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation until March 1983, this Agreement was then taken over by Food from Britain.

Patients (Statistics)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the numbers of inpatients, day cases and outpatients attendances in Wales in 1978 and 1984, together with the percentage change.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Heart Bypass Operations

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the percentage change in the number of patients accepted for heart bypass operations in Wales between 1978 and 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of heart bypass operations carried out in Wales increased by 154 per cent. between 1978 and 1984.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the percentage change in the number of new patients accepted for kidney failure treatment in Wales between 1978 and 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of new patients accepted for all types of treatment of end-stage renal failure in Wales has increased by 110 per cent. between 1978 and 1984.

Perinatal Deaths

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the percentage change in the number of perinatal deaths in Wales between 1978 and 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Number of perinatal deaths		Percentage change
1978	1984	1978-1984

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the numbers of doctors, dentists, health visitors, district nurses and midwives in Wales in 1978 and 1984 and the percentage change in their numbers.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

	1978	1984	Percentage change 1978-1984
General Medical practitioners (number)	1,418	1,661	+17
General dental practitioners (number)	598	714	+19

* Does not take into account the fact that the working week changed from 40 hours to 37½ hours in 1980.

Home Helps

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the numbers of home helps in Wales in 1978 and 1984, and the percentage change in their numbers.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There were 3,463 home helps in Wales in 1984, and increase of 20 per cent. on the figure of 2,894 in 1978. The numbers are both expressed in terms of whole-time equivalents.

Health Authorities (Funding)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give figures for the overall growth in funding of district health authorities in Wales, between 1979-80 and 1985-86 in financial and in percentage terms.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Between 1979-80 and 1985-86 the growth funds available to health authorities in Wales was £87·8 million or 16·3 per cent. after taking into account changes in pay and prices in the NHS.

TRANSPORT

Municipal Airports (Privatisation)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what control will be exercised over capital receipts from the privatisation sales of municipal airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Under existing legislation capital receipts cannot be used to finance current expenditure. For capital expenditure, the Secretary of State for the Environment prescribed a proportion of receipts that may be added to each authority's annual allocation. For 1985-86 the proportion is 30 per cent. for all receipts other than for housing. The remainder can be used for financing expenditure within the allocation, subject to 10 per cent. virement between years. The Government is at present considering how the current system should be improved.

Motor Vehicles (Ownership)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to make proof of ownership of a car registration necessary before a number plate is produced.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Such legislation would be very difficult to enforce in present circumstances. However my Department is reviewing with the British Standards Institute the possible inclusion of number plates in a kite mark scheme, as a basis for tightening control of the sale of plates.

Merchant Navy (Defence Role)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the shipping economics advisory group study on the availability of merchant shipping for a defence role will be complete.

Mr. Ridley: I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library today. For reasons of confidentiality, at a few points in the copy information has been consolidated.

Local Government Act 1985

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he plans to issue any indication of his policy regarding the size of Government subsidies to passenger transport joint boards and the account he is taking of the implications of the level of Government financial support for fare levels in the light of the enactment of the Local Government Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Policy on subsidies to public transport services in the metropolitan counties, including policy on fare levels, will from 1 April 1986 be the responsibility of the new passenger transport authorities established under the Local Government Act 1985. These authorities will be eligible for Government grants, including rate support grant. I have made clear on many occasions my view that present levels of revenue support to public transport services in the metropolitan areas are excessive, and in May my Department issued advice to the passenger transport executives that they should plan on the assumption that the level of revenue support for 1986-87 will be between five per cent. and 15 per cent. in cash terms below the protected expenditure level set for 1985-86. For their first three financial years the new authorities will be subject to precept control under the Rates Act 1984. Expenditure levels under the provisions of that Act will be determined as soon as the authorities are constituted.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to how many new fishing vessels have been registered in (a) Grimsby, (b) Hull, (c) Fleetwood, (d) Aberdeen and (e) Peterhead since 1 January 1983.

Mr. MacGregor: The number of commercial fishing vessels (over 10 metres in length) either newly built or new to the United Kingdom fleet and registered since 1 January 1983 are as follows:

	Number
Grimsby	1
Hull	3
Fleetwood	1
Aberdeen	9
Peterhead	10

In addition, a number of vessels have been transferred from ports elsewhere in the United Kingdom since 1 January 1983 and reregistered at these ports. The numbers (of over 10 metre vessels) are as follows:

	Number
Grimsby	3
Hull	0
Fleetwood	*8
Aberdeen	12
Peterhead	9

* Four of the 8 Fleetwood vessels are no longer fishing or have since been sold elsewhere.

Finally, vessels may be transferred to ports and be based there but are not reregistered, e.g. there are eight such vessels at Fleetwood. No meaningful information is available for under 10 metre vessels.

Fishing Inspectors (Grading)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will authorise fisheries inspectors to compare the grading of fish coming to Grimsby onshore from Scotland and Ireland with that locally landed.

Mr. MacGregor: Responsibility for grading fresh and chilled fish to EC standards lies with the industry. As part of the advisory and supervisory role of the fisheries inspectorate, the chief inspector is currently engaged on an examination of grading performance at Grimsby and a number of other ports.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Hoyle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the location of the 145 intervention stores in England and Scotland which were referred to by the hon. Member for South Norfolk in his reply of 1 July, Official Report, column 30; and what uses other than animal feed is made of the wheat.

Mr. MacGregor: Wheat is now held in 146 intervention stores at the following locations in England and Scotland. Wheat has a number of uses. Unless covered by special arrangemens, there would be no restriction on the use of wheat sold from intervention.

Veterinary Investigation Service Study

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now make a further statement on the efficiency study of the Veterinary Investigation Service.

Mr. Jopling: In my statement of 15 April on this study I announced a period of consultation with outside interests. That period is now at an end and I am studying the points made to me. I will also shortly be receiving the cost appraisals I referred to. I will make a comprehensive statement as soon as possible after the summer recess. In the meantime, however, I confirm the planned closure of Liverpool VI centre and the transfer of the work from there to the new centre at Barton Hall, Preston, once this is completed and becomes operational, which is expected to be about the end of September.

Bell Report

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is now able to make the further statement on the recommendations contained in Professor Bell's report of a study of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service promised in the answer to the hon. Member for Sherwood on 24 May, Official Report, column 582.

Mr. Jopling: When I announced on 13 November column 164 the report by the new Director General of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, I said that I endorsed the conclusion that in principle it was entirely appropriate that farmers and others in the industry who avail themselves of the services of ADAS should contribute to their costs. I have also made it clear that the Government plan to reduce the net cost of ADAS advisory and statutory services by about £16·5 million in the financial year 1987-88. In my original statement on Professor Bell's report, I said that I was proceeding to a detailed examination of what would be involved in the implementation of his recommendations. One of those recommendations was that consideration should be given to the possibilities of charging users for part or all of any service (including work under statutory schemes) where there is an identifiable benefit to the customer. Following detailed consideration of that recommendation I am now ready to initiate discussions with the industry about the overall scope for raising revenue for advisory and statutory work and the areas in which it might be raised.

So far as advisory work is concerned I envisage a mixture of types of charge and types of advisory provision. These would include fees or subscriptions for specified ranges of advice, and specific charges for other services both to individuals and organisations and to groups of farmers acting in association. Statutory work makes up over one third of the work of ADAS. In this context I wish to explore charging possibilities in areas within which ADAS undertakes work in pursuit of animal, plant and public health and standards objectives.

In addition to revenue from charging, savings in ADAS manpower will also contribute to the reduction in the net cost of ADAS to which I refer above. But the extent of these savings and hence the resulting range of services which ADAS will be able to provide must depend on the response of the industry both to charging for advice and the proposed extension of charging for statutory work. Moreover, it is clear that services to be charged for should be carried out as efficiently and economically as possible. Taking into account the useful results of various studies of areas of ADAS activity I have commissioned in recent years, I intend to see what additional savings and improvements in efficiency can be made.

Consultations with industry are already in progress on the funding of research and development work undertaken within ADAS and by other research organisations. ADAS research and development resources will also be available for contract work. The quality of the work of ADAS research and development establishments will in future be subject to review by independent visiting groups.

To help ADAS meet the new challenges that face it, I intend to constitute a management board, which, under the chairmanship of the Director General, will consist of the four heads of services, the newly created director of ADAS administration, a representative from Wales and three outside members who, I hope, will between them have experience in the areas of marketing, information technology, the farming industry and industrial research and development. In addition, a marketing officer for ADAS will be appointed at a senior level who will have access to outside expertise.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Court Costs Riot Trial (Costs)

Mr. Barron asked the Attorney-General what were the costs of the prosecution for the Doncaster coal house riot trial held at the Sheffield crown court; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The costs of the prosecution in this case are to be paid from central funds and are subject to taxation by the appropriate officer of the court. The costs awarded will be such sums as appear to the officer reasonably sufficient to compensate the prosecutor for the expenses properly incurred by him in carrying on the proceedings. This process of taxation has not yet begun.

Mr. Barron asked the Attorney-General what were the costs of the prosecution for the Orgreave riot trial held at the Sheffield crown court; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The costs of the prosecution in R v. Greenaway and others are to be paid from central funds and are subject to taxation by the appropriate officer of the court. The costs awarded will be such sums as appear to the officer reasonably sufficient to compensate the prosecutor for the expenses properly incurred by him in carrying on the proceedings. The process of taxation has not yet begun.

THE ARTS

Export of Works of Art (Report)

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether the Minister for the Arts will request the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art so to arrange its timetable that its report covering the year ended 30 June is made available to the public not later than nine months after the conclusion of the 12-month period reported upon.

Mr. Waldegrave: The aim each year is to publish the report of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art as soon as possible after the end of the period covered. Exceptionally heavy case loads in two consecutive years resulted in delay in the publication of the 1983-84 report. It is hoped to achieve publication of the 1984-85 report within the period stated by the hon. Member.

CIVIL SERVICE

Private Security Companies

Mr. Dubs asked the Minister for the Civil Service how staff of private security companies are vetted when working for Government Departments.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is the responsibility of individual Government Departments to ensure the suitability of any private company and its employees for work on their behalf. It would not be appropriate to give details of the steps taken to do so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Professions (Competition)

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to increase competition in the professions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Competition in the professions, as elsewhere, can be a powerful force for protecting the interests of consumers by encouraging greater efficiency and the provision of better service, lower prices and wider choice. The Government have already done much to relax restrictions in the professions. For example, we have ended the optician's monopoly on the dispensing of spectacles; legislation has been brought forward this Session to allow licensed conveyancers to compete with solicitors for conveyancing work; and restrictions on fee scales and advertising imposed by a number of professional bodies on their members, including architects and surveyors, solicitors, accountants, stockbrokers, opticians and vets, have been relaxed.

These measures have been taken after careful assessment of the nature and effect of the restrictions involved, in most cases by the Director General of Fair Trading or the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. I propose to continue this process of scrutiny of restrictions in the professions with a view to establishing whether further relaxations would now be justified.

There remain a number of professional bodies which continue to impose restrictions on advertising by their members. Although mandatory fee scales appear no longer to be in use, some professional bodies recommend what level of fees their members should charge. This practice, taken together with other restrictions such as on advertising, may have much the same effect as a mandatory scale. There are also some restrictions on the legal form of business through which a member of a profession may practise; and the practice of some professions is restricted by statute to registered practitioners. The origin of these restrictions was no doubt a concern to safeguard the interests of the public. But any restrictions on competition need to be reviewed from time to time to see whether they remain appropriate to changing circumstances.

I have therefore consulted the Director General of Fair Trading about a programme of work which his office might conduct over the next 12 months. We have agreed that this programme should include:

(i) A review of the right of representation held by patent agents and solicitors under the Patents Act 1977, which I have asked the Director General to undertake in order to give effect to the recommendation for such a review in Sir Robin Nicholson's Green Paper "Intellectual Property Rights and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9117); and a review of advertising and charging restrictions relating to patent agents.

(ii) A review of advertising and charging restrictions in the professions serving the construction industries (including consulting, structural and civil engineers).

(iii) A review of remaining significant advertising restrictions elsewhere in the professions; and

(iv) A review of restrictions on the kind of organisation through which members of professions may offer their services (for example, restrictions on inter-professional links or mixed partnerships).

This is a substantial programme for carrying forward the government's policy of promoting competition in the professions. The Director General expects that the phased programme of reviews will be completed by August 1986.

Exports (Profitability)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his answer of 5 July, if he will list the factors which have caused the relative profitability of exports to increase since 1978 despite a 25 per cent. increase in relative unit labour costs; and if he will make a statement regarding the criteria which determined his use of relative profitability as a measure of competitiveness.

Mr. Fletcher: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade gave on 16 July regarding the relationship between relative unit labour costs and the relative profitability of exports. While the latter is not a direct measure of international competitiveness in the same way as the former, it is a useful indicator of the economic background to our export performance.

EC (Trade Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his written reply dated 5 July concerning trade of the United Kingdom in Germany, to what factors he attributes the fact that (a) the EC share of United Kingdom exports has not increased over the six-year period and (b) the EC share of imports has increased.

Mr. Fletcher: There were no large changes in the EC share of United Kingdom exports and imports of manufactures between the first quarters of 1979 and 1985. The figures, consistent with the previous answer, are in the table.

Argentina

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of British exports to Argentina in 1980-81 and 1981-82 measured in fixed prices; and what was the equivalent value of Argentine imports for each of the same years.

Mr. Fletcher: The value of United Kingdom exports and imports measured in fixed prices is not available. In the period April 1980 to March 1981, United Kingdom exports in current prices were valued at £155 million and United Kingdom imports at £145 million.

Figures for the corresponding period in 1981-1982 were £105 million and £175 million, respectively.

Steel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total volume of steel imported from the European Economic Community and from the rest of the world, respectively, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available and in each of the previous nine years.

Mr. Fletcher: The following is the information:

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the percentage reduction in steel capacity in the United Kingdom and each of the member states of the European Economic Community since the beginning of 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The following is the available information:

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received British Shipbuilders annual report and accounts for 1984-85.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In accordance with sections 17(9) and 18(6) of the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977, my right hon. Friend will tomorrow lay before each House copies of British Shipbuilders' annual report and accounts for 1984-85.

Computer Software (Schools)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to ensure the supply of software to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Yes. As a result of this Government's policies we have a more highly developed use of computers in the United Kingdom than any other comparable country.

The Government wish to maintain the momentum created and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is announcing today a new programme for England, Wales and Northern Ireland to replace the microelectronics education programme after March 1986.

My Department intends to contine its support for the education system in this field. In particular we need to ensure that hardware already installed is supported by an adequate supply of educational software. We have decided, therefore, to provide additional help in this area during the current financial year, 1986-87 and 1987-88. Accordingly, sums of £0·5 million, £2 million and £1 million have been set aside in each of the three financial years concerned for local education authorities and independent secondary schools. The purpose of this support is to enable the education system to buy more educational software from the commercial sector. The scheme will apply throughout the United Kingdom. It represents support for the consumer rather than the producer and local education authorities will be free to make their own decisions about which software to buy.

I regard this as significant support by the Government for both the education system and educational software suppliers which will help schools to make full use of their existing investment in hardware. I hope that as a result of this support, software houses and educational publishers will recognise the determination of the Government to maintain the British lead in this area and that they will consider further investment in education software accordingly. The scheme should also provide a solid base in the United Kingdom from which our companies can take advantage of export opportunities.

Sumrie Clothes plc Leeds

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will institute an inquiry under the Companies Acts into the activities of Sumrie Clothes plc, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1985]: I am considering whether any action by my Department should be taken in respect of alleged breaches of the Companies Act.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Mortgages

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to seek to stop moves by local authorities to dispose of their mortgages en-bloc to institutions in order to circumvent limits on capital expenditure.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Local authorities have normally retained mortgages until they have been redeemed by the individual borrower in the same way as private sector lenders such as the building societies and the banks. Last autumn, however, I welcomed the initiative which a number of local authorities and new town corporations were taking to speed up this process by arranging for building societies to offer replacement loans to the authority's borrowers individually enabling them to pay off their council mortgages. The borrower is free to decide whether or not to enter into a new mortgage contract with the building society, which may offer better terms. And the local authority gets the advantage of an earlier capital receipt.

Recently, however, some authorities have packaged their mortgage loans and sold them direct to financial institutions, without consulting the borrowers, in order to generate in a short time large blocks of additional capital receipts. This is an artificial transaction and should not count as an addition to capital receipts. Moreover, the borrower may have no say in the matter, and may be unaware of the transaction until after the event. We believe that local authorities should not sell a mortgage without the prior consent of the mortgagor.

Accordingly, the Government propose to legislate at the earliest opportunity to give home owners with a local authority mortgage the right to decide whether or not the local authority may dispose of its interest to a specified purchaser. A transfer without consent would be invalid. In order to give interim protection to such mortgagors, our intention is that the legislation conferring this right should have retrospective effect as from midnight tonight.

We shall also consider whether the borrower's consent should be required before a local authority sells a mortgage of industrial or commercial property; we shall consult on this.

Some sales of mortgages have taken place on terms which may leave the local authority with a continuing financial risk in relation to the mortgage. Such transactions are, in substance, the equivalent of expensive borrowing rather than a genuine disposal of assets.

Subject to further consideration and consultation on the practicalities, we intend to legislate to require that any sale of a mortgage should provide for the transfer of risk to the purchaser, if it is to be treated as a capital receipt; but any requirement of this kind would not have effect from today.

My Department is writing today to local authorities and other interested organisations to draw this announcement to their attention, and to consult on the details of the proposal. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is writing in similar terms to Welsh local authorities.

EC (Water Quality)

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the implementation of the European Community directive on the "Quality of Water Intended for Human Consumption", 80/778/EEC.

Mr. Gow: The EC directive on the "Quality of Water Intended for Human Consumption" was notified to member Governments on 17 July 1980. They were required to comply with it within five years.

The directive lays down standards for concentrations of chemical, toxic or microbiological material present in drinking water; and for its other qualities. It allows member states, in defined circumstances, to authorise departures from some of these standards, by granting derogations, provided that these do not constitute a public health hazard (article 9). It also provides for member states to obtain the agreement of the Commission to an extended period within which to achieve the directive's standards by means of a timetabled programme of action (article 20).

In order to implement the directive, water authorities and water companies were asked in August 1982 to review their water supplies in the light of the directive's standards. Ninety per cent. of public water supplies meet the directive's standards in all respects. The Department has considered 350 applications in respect of parameters in particular water supply zones in conjunction with medical officers of the Department of Health and Social Security.

In the coming weeks, the Government will take the following action:

—We have been committed since August 1983 to reducing the lead content of drinking water by December 1989. We shall seek the agreement of the Commission, under article 20, to the completion of the necessary treatment programmes by that date.

—In respect of nitrate, we shall grant time-limited derogations if, and only if, the concentration of nitrate ion in supply does not exceed a three-monthly average of 80 mg/litre and a maximum of 100mg/litre save in exceptional and transitory circumstances. In those circumstances, and generally, water undertakers will be required to comply with the advice given by the Joint Committee on the Medical Aspects of Water Quality in April 1984. I have placed in the Library of the House a memorandum on nitrate in drinking water. This includes correspondence which I have had with the Chief Medical Officer, DHSS, who confirms that my policy is consistent with the current state of medical knowledge.

—The directive lays down a single standard for pesticides. However, this is now inappropriate, in the light of the greater diversity of pesticides now available, and greater knowledge of their effects. We shall request the EC Commission to review the pesticide parameter.

—After taking medical advice, we shall grant derogations in respect of some 150 supplies which exceed other standards laid down in the directive, most commonly in respect of the concentrations of manganese and iron.

—Private water supplies have not hitherto come within the full statutory framework governing the wholesomeness of drinking water and we shall seek EC Commission agreement to a 10-year delay in the implementation of the directive in relation to private supplies serving fewer than 500 people.

—Derogations are not available in respect of toxic or microbiological parameters. The review has shown that some supplies fall marginally short of microbiological standards and we shall seek EC Commission agreement to the necessary programme of improvement which will be carried out urgently.

In applying the directive we are allowing no relaxation in present standards of drinking water quality and have identified such further programmes of action as are needed. Water undertakers follow guidelines laid down by the World Health Organisation in 1970, on which the directive's standards are based. For that reason, the recent review of public water supplies has not given rise to substantial new programmes of remedial work.

Nevertheless, the Government, in common with other European Community states, welcome the adoption of explicit and ascertainable criteria for the wholesomeness of drinking water, and the extra protection of public health afforded by the directive.

River Mersey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the major sources of pollution of the Mersey with percentages, their location and the substance that is discharged.

Mr. Waldegrave: Responsibility for the control of pollution in the River Mersey lies with the North West water authority and comprehensive information is not held by my Department.

Thamesmead

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any present plans to visit Thamesmead.

Sir George Young: I plan to visit Thamesmead again on 1 August and will meet representatives of the Thamesmead Community Association.

North-East Hampshire Structure Plan

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answers of 7 May, Official Report, column 299 and 10 July, Official Report, column 479, if he will make a statement on the delay in the publication of the report of the North-East Hampshire structure plan, and give a date for its eventual publication.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Publication of the report of the examination in public of the proposed alteration to the North-East Hampshire structure plan has been awaiting completion of full consideration of all the recommendations in the report and all the objections and representations. The report will be published shortly.

House Building

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the expected level of investment in public sector house building in each of the next three years, expressed in both cash and real terms using 1985 as a base year, and for private house building over the same period.

Mr. Gow: The White Paper on the Government's "Public Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428) shows gross capital expenditure on housing as:

	million
1985-86	3,051
1986-87	3,120
1987-88	3,150

The equivalent figures in real terms at 1985-86 prices are:

	million
1985-86	3,051
1986-87	2,995
1987-88	2,911

No plans have been published for 1988-89. My Department makes no forecast of what proportion of this planned expenditure will be used for house building, nor does it make any forecast of investment in private house building.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environmet if he will publish a list showing the physical, chemical and radioactive nature of the types of waste likely to arise in decommissioning a typical Magnox nuclear power station, distinguishing each stage of decommissioning and, for each type of waste, stating (a) the approximate volume arising, (b) the approximate specific activity and (c) the approximate radioactive half-life.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is to be found in the Central Electricity Generating Board report entitled "Proposals for Decommissioning Magnox Nuclear Power Stations", a copy of which will shortly be available in the Library of the House.

Council Houses

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish in the Official Report the average cost of rate fund contribution and main housing subsidy for each occupied council house in England at the latest available date.

Sir George Young: The available information for local authorities in England for 1984-85 is as follows. The figures are based on estimates provided by local authorities in their housing subsidy claim forms for the year, and allow for an estimated national average of 2·3 per cent. vacant dwellings.

Main housing subsidy per occupied dwelling	88
Rate fund contribution per occupied dwelling (Net of transfers from housing revenue account to general rate fund)	94

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how his Department has responded to the United Nations international year of shelter for the homeless, 1987.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) on 18 July.

Oil and Gas Exploration (Corporation)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received advocating the amendment of the Land Compensation Act 1973 so as to create a statutory right for householders affected by oil and gas-related activities to claim compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: In addition to my hon. Friend's recent letter on this subject, my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) has also raised this issue with me. I see no reason why oil and gas operations should be made the only form of private sector development subject to statutory compensation under the Land Compensation Act 1973. I shall be writing to my hon. Friend shortly to explain why.

Metropolitan Councils (Staff)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he plans to issue any guidance to staff of the metropolitan councils about their future job prospects in the light of the enactment of the Local Government Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have no present plans to add to the guidance to staff contained in the paper entitled "Abolition of the GLC and MCCs, Arrangements for Staffing the New Structure", issued in November 1984. But the "Guidance Note to Metropolitan District Councils", which my Department issued on 16 July, reminds successor authorities of their duties under the Local Government Act 1985 and the need to take early steps, within procedures laid down by the Staff Commission, to make offers of jobs to staff they will need to meet their new or enhanced responsibilities.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take to establish satisfactory severance terms for those employees of the South Yorkshire county council who may be adversely affected by the Local Government Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend will, after consultations with interested bodies, make regulations under section 24 of the Superannuation Act 1972 to provide for compensation to any local authority employee who may suffer loss of employment in consequence of any provision made by or under the Local Government Act 1985. The compensation terms will combine fairness to the staff concerned with fairness to the ratepayers who will bear the costs.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in the light of the various changes made in the passage of the Local Government Bill, and in particular those relating to funding voluntary organisations, he will now revise the estimated savings expected to arise in the metropolitan counties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, when he next meets chairmen of the south west water authorities, he will raise with them the accuracy of information being disseminated by water authorities concerning the possible effects of privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The South West water authority's views on privatisation are contained in its response to my Department's discussion paper. This has been placed in the Library of the House, together with memoranda received from other water authorities, the Water Authorities Association, and the Water Companies Association. South West raises a number of points which will need to be considered, if privatisation goes ahead, but, like the Water Authorities Association, makes no recommendation for or against privatisation. The Government are considering the responses they have received in the context of their own examination of the prospects for privatisation in the water industry. If our study of the issues brings to light any points that need to be taken up further with the water authorities, we shall certainly pursue them.

Rosehill Estate

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now make a statement arising from the deputation seen by officials on 18 July on what action is to be taken to ensure that the Walsall council has sufficient resources to undertake the modernisation of Rosehill estate, Willenhall.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Liverpool City Council

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an assurance that rate support grant will continue to be paid to Liverpool city council at the same level as that paid during the first three months of the current financial year.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: No. Following the House's approval of the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report for 1985-86, the city council will, from 7 August, be paid grant based on the budget of £265 million included in its resolution of 14 June.

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make arrangements to meet a delegation from Liverpool city council to discuss questions such as disregards, capital and partnership allocations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: As I indicated to the hon. Member when I met him and other hon. Members for Liverpool on 15 July, I do not believe that at the moment there are any grounds for my meeting a delegation from Liverpool city council. But I shall of course consider carefully any written representations the city council wishes to make.

Traditional Urban Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities received allocations under the traditional urban programme for each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is as follows:

	Authorities receiving main phase approvals Number
1978-79	88
1979-80	119
1980-81	111
1981-82	145
1982-83	167
1983-84	163
1984-85	134
1985-86	106

The total for 1978-79 and 1979-80 includes allocations to nine partnership and 15 programme authorities which in later years became ineligible for approvals through the traditional urban programme. A further eight authorities became ineligible in 1984-85 following their promotion to programme authority status.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes for the traditional urban programme for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The limited resources available under the traditional urban programme will continue to be concentrated on fewer authorities. In these circumstances, my right hon. Friend does not consider that it is any longer appropriate to issue a general circular inviting new bids. Instead, we will be putting to the local authority associations proposals for issuing invitations to specific local authorities.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any changes in the housing factor E7 used in calculating grant-related expenditure allocation.

Sir George Young: Proposals for changes to the assessment of the E7 GRE component for 1986-87 have come forward in this year's round of consultations with the local authorities on GRE development. No decisions on any options have yet been taken. My right hon. Friend will be considering all the possibilities shortly, and will announce his decisions in due course, as part of the RSG settlement for 1986-87.

Radioactive Wastes

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made with the study of the best practicable environmental options for radioactive wastes following the Halliday report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: An interim report has been produced on methodology and data, and I have today placed copies in the Library of the House. The overall purpose of the study is to consider disposal and storage options for low and intermediate-level wastes which would be individually acceptable in terms of radiation exposure, and compare them to establish their relative merits for any given type of waste. The interim report on methodology and data summarises work undertaken in the first phase of the study, and will enable my Department to review the approaches and models adopted, in consultations with the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee, the Trades Union Congress and others concerned, and identify issues which need further consideration before preparing the final report of the study, which is due for completion by the end of the year. No clear conclusions emerge at this stage.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permanent local residents were employed in the construction of the Falklands Islands airport; and what was the total number employed in the construction of the airport.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1985]: The Falkland islands Government have made it clear that the local labour force is so limited that any significant recruitment by PSA contractors could prejudice Government services. The PSA has therefore instructed its contractors to consult the Falkland Islands Government before recruiting local workers. At present the Laing-Mowlem-Amey Roadstone Construction joint venture are employing one Falkland islander on the Mount Pleasant airport project. There are currently 2,000 other contractors' employees engaged on the project. In accordance with United Kingdom policy, these workers have been recruited in the United Kingdom.

Housing Investment Programme (Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the housing investment programme allocation made to the city of Manchester for 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 at constant prices.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1985]:

The final housing investment programme allocations made to the city of Manchester in each of the years in question, at constant 1984-85 prices, are as follows.

	£ million
1982-83	58·439
1983-84	46·643
1984-85	40·499
1985-86	34·498

In addition, local authorities are able to supplement their allocations by the prescribed proportion of any capital receipts which they generate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Complaints Board

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the final review report of the Police Complaints Board.

Mr. Brittan: The report is published today.

On behalf of the Government, I wish to record my thanks to Sir Cyril Philips and his colleagues and their predecessors on the board for their work since June 1977. The board made a major contribution to the task of maintaining and developing public confidence in the police during those years, and it paved the way for the new developments in regard to police complaints of which the creation of the Police Complaints Authority is the major element. The board has provided an excellent foundation on which the new authority can build.

Carers (Criminal Records)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is yet able to announce the conclusions of his review of the disclosure of information on the criminal background of those seeking positions which would give them substantial access to children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I have received the first report of the review, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. The report recommends a wide extension of the arrangements for checking the criminal background of those seeking to work with children and improvements in the arrangements for reporting convictions for offences committed after engagement. The proposed scheme would apply in the first instance to those seeking to work in the statutory sector, whether on a paid or voluntary basis, and would enable senior nominated staff of the relevant statutory bodies to make thorough checks on any criminal record through local police forces. Applicants would be asked to disclose in advance any convictions or cautions recorded against them, and to agree in writing to the check being made.

I welcome the proposals in the report, which provide a valuable basis for improving the protection of children. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health and Social Services, for Education and Science and for Wales and I will now hold urgent consultations with interested organisations, with a view to bringing new arrangements into early effect. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland will also be considering what implications the report may have for their own disclosure arrangements.

While these consultations are taking place, the review will proceed to consider what checking arrangements might suitably be introduced to cover those working in the voluntary sector, with the aim of submitting a second report before the end of the year.

The new arrangements will be on a non-statutory basis, but I am confident that they can be made to work effectively for the benefit of the children they are designed to protect, while at the same time providing appropriate safeguards for those who will be the subject of checks. But I should be willing to consider introducing legislation if experience shows that it is required.

Fire Precautions Act 1971

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the review of the Fire Precautions Act 1971 has been completed.

Mr. Brittan: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I have today published a consultative document entitled "A Review of the Fire Precautions Act 1971". The document embodies proposals, formulated over several years within the machinery of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Councils for England and Wales and for Scotland, for a modified system of fire precautions controls which would replace the fire certification arrangements of the current system with a statutory duty on the owners-occupiers of premises put to a designated use to achieve and maintain a reasonable standard of fire safety. We are most grateful to the organisations represented on the CFBACs for helping to bring this work to a successful conclusion in the publication of this document. I should, however, emphasise that the proposals in no sense represent final conclusions and my right hon. Friend and I will want to consider them again in the light of comments which are made on them. I have in particular, invited Mr. Justice Popplewell to consider the proposals in the context of his inquiry into the operation of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 following the Bradford fire, so that any relevant conclusions can be taken into account.

Copies of the consultative document, on which written comments are invited by 31 December 1985, are being sent to fire authorities and to other interested bodies and individuals, and copies have also been placed in the Library of the House. Further copies can be obtained on request in writing to the Home Office Fire and Emergency Planning Department, Room 916, Home Office, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1H 9AT.

Prisoners (Release)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the arrangements for the release into the community from hospital of prisoners sentenced to life imprisonment who are subsequently transferred to and remain in hospital under the provisions of section 47 of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Brittan: When life sentence prisoners transferred to hospital under the Mental Health Act 1983 are to be released, it has hitherto been the practice to discharge such persons on a warrant of conditional discharge under section 42(3) of the Act. I now intend to use the powers available to me under section 50(1)(b) of the Act, which enables me to release such persons under the same arrangements as those they would have been subject to had they remained in, or been returned to, prison. This means that, in future, such persons will normally be released on life licences under the provisions of section 61 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, in accordance with the sentencing courts' intention, that is, on the recommendation of the Parole Board and after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and, if available, the trial judge. In exceptional cases, where the Lord Chief Justice and the trial judge so recommend, I will be prepared to consider whether it would be more appropriate to authorise discharge under section 42(3) of the 1983 Act.

Under the new procedure, a life sentence prisoner who has been transferred to hospital, can be released on life licence without having to return to prison before release. Persons released on life licence under these arrangements will be subject to recall to prison under the provisions of section 62 of the 1967 Act. Should their mental condition be such that they are recommended for transfer to hospital this could very quickly be effected under the provisions of section 47 of the 1983 Act.

Detained Persons

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in prison department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1984 following completion of a custodial sentence.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish records of those detained under Immigration Act powers on a regular basis.

Mr. Waddington: Figures of detention orders served under paragraph 2 of schedule 3 to the Immigration Act 1971 and of illegal entrants detained are already regularly published in "Control of Immigration: Statistics" and information on persons received into prison under the powers of the Immigration Act 1971 is likewise already published in "Prison Statistics". The collection of information on the numbers of persons detained under Immigration Act powers has been recently extended and the question of whether and in what form further information should be published is under consideration.

Recidivism

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of (a) male and (b) female adult prisoners discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years;

(2) what percentage of (a) male and (b) female young prisoners discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years;

(3) what percentage of (a) male and (b) female juvenile borstal trainees discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years;

(4) what percentage of (a) male and (b) female young adult borstal trainees discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years;

(5) what percentage of juvenile detention centre trainees discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years;

(6) what percentage of young adult detention centre trainees discharged during 1981 were reconvicted within two years.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information relates to persons convicted within two year of discharge from prison department establishments in 1980 and is published in tables 8(b) and 8(e) of "Prison Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9363). Similar information for persons discharged in 1981 will be published soon in the volume for 1984.

Stonehenge

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many complaints have been registered against the police in connection with the operation at Stonehenge on 1 June;

(2) whether any police officers have been disciplined as a result of police action at Stonehenge on 1 June.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The present position is that 12 formal complaints relating to police action at Cholderton on 1 June are being investigated by a senior officer from Surrey in accordance with the procedures laid down in part 9 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The Police Complaints Authority has been notified and is supervising the investigation. One further complaint is no longer being pursued by the complainant.

Gun Thefts

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the record of thefts from licensed owners of (a) shotguns, (b) rifles and (c) hand guns, in England and Wales, and in Scotland, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information relates to England and Wales and is given in the table. The information collected centrally does not distinguish those weapons which were stolen from certificate holders. The position in Scotland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

British Subjects (Passports)

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he uses in determining whether an applicant who has proved his status as a British subject but who is not a British national under the terms of the British Nationality Act 1981 should be issued with a passport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: A British passport describing the holder as a British subject may be issued only to an applicant who produces satisfactory evidence that he has the status of a British subject within the meaning of part IV of the British Nationality Act 1981.

Protection of Children Act 1978

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought against persons charged only with offences under the Protection of Children Act 1978 in each full year since July 1978; and what were the corresponding numbers of convictions.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, is given in the following table. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Immigration (Indian Subcontinent)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to ensure that questioning procedures with regard to visitors arriving in the United Kingdom from the Indian subcontinent are made more efficient and that refreshment facilities are provided at more regular intervals; and what plans he has to increase the number of immigration officers at Heathrow and other airports to receive and question such visitors in order to reduce the work load of the present number already employed there.

Mr. Waddington: Immigration service staff are deployed in a way that is designed to enable the majority of passengers to pass through the control in the shortest practicable time. But at peak arrival periods, particularly in the early mornings at Heathrow, terminal 3, the simultaneous arrival of large numbers of passengers is bound to lead to delays. We try to keep these to a minimum, but there are limits to the extent for which we can employ staff just to deal with this peak demand.

A small minority of passengers have to be referred for secondary examination and the substantial growth of passenger traffic this year has contributed to an increase in their numbers. Where further examination is necessary, priority is given to the elderly and those with young children. Cases requiring additional interviews can be transferred to the port or airport nearest to the sponsor's home.

The refreshment facilities are satisfactory at the detention units at Harmondsworth and Queen's Building, Heathrow. Drinks and light refreshments are available in the secondary examination area at Heathrow, terminal 3, but I am aware that there have been some recent difficulties at times of pressure and the present arrangements are being reviewed.

The availability of immigration service staff including interpreters to meet peak demands is kept under constant review and staff are redeployed between ports in the light of variations of traffic.

Racial Harassment (Statistics)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will provide a breakdown by London borough of charges brought and type of charge laid against persons in relation to racial attacks and racial harassment for 1984 and the first six months of 1985;

(2) if he will provide a breakdown by London borough of the conviction rate for charges brought against persons for racist attacks and racial harassment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not collated in the form requested. The number of reported racial incidents in all Metropolitan police districts which resulted in arrests was 197 for 1984 and 113 in the first six months of 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown, by London borough, of cases of racial attack and racial harassment for the first six months of 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Statistics on racial incidents are not kept on a borough basis. The figures for reported racial incidents in the Metropolitan police area by district from 1 January 1985 to 30 June 1985 are given in the table:

Police Service (Civilianisation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from all chief constables as to the progress of implementation of the recommendations in the 1983 report entitled "Police Service: Civilianisation and Related Matters" and as to the cost savings so far achieved through the substitution of civilians for police officers in certain aspects of police work.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. This report was prepared by the former Audit Inspectorate of the Department of the Environment (now Audit Commission). Its report recognised, as we do, that civilianisation cannot be considered in cost terms alone. Our policies were set out in Home Office Circular No. 114/1983 on "Manpower, Effectiveness and Efficiency in the Police Service", which is in the Library.

Metropolitan Police and Docklands Forum

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contact is maintained between the Metropolitan police and the Docklands forum.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the commander of "H" district and the chairman of the Docklands forum have provisionally agreed to the setting up of a sub-committee of the forum to look at the changing policing needs of docklands. The sub-committee will include representatives of all police districts covering docklands and, subject to the approval of the full forum, is likely to start work shortly.

ENERGY

Spent Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how the costs of reprocessing spent thermal oxide fuel compare with those for dry storage of such fuel.

Mr. Goodlad: Oxide fuel is not currently being reprocessed in the United Kingdom. At this stage any comparison must be speculative and would need to take account of the cost of subsequent treatment of fuel after dry storage, whether that be by reprocessing or direct disposal, and other factors such as the availability and price of fresh uranium.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimates he has made of the maximum safe storage periods for advanced gas-cooled reactors and pressurised water reactors spent nuclear fuel, respectively, in wet and dry storage facilities.

Mr. Goodlad: No firm estimates are available, but I am advised that both PWR and AGR fuel could in principle be stored in dry conditions for a considerable time before reprocessing or disposal. PWR fuel can also be stored in water for very long periods. AGR fuel may be stored under water for 10 years or more given satisfactory pond conditions.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what have been the trends in costs of reprocessing spent thermal oxide fuel and in the price of uranium fuel in the past five years.

Mr. Goodlad: The price of nuclear fuel reflects a number of factors including the cost of uranium ore, fuel enrichment and fuel fabrication. Recently nuclear fuel costs have declined and this trend may continue for some time. Oxide fuel is not reprocessed in the United Kingdom at present.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what research and development work has been done on the decommissioning of magnox nuclear power stations; and what has been the cost of such work.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB has been carrying out a programme of research and development specifically on the decommissioning of its magnox nuclear power stations for the last five years. The approximate total cost involved amounts to £1 million.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the approximate cost of decommissioning a typical magnox nuclear power station to (a) stage 1, (b) stage 2 and (c) stage 3, stating the assumptions made about the timing of each stage of decommissioning and excluding the costs of dispersal of the radioactive waste.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB has estimated decommissioning costs for a typical magnox nuclear power station as follows (1982 prices):

Stage 1 (removal of fuel and operational wastes): about £25 million. This will take about five years following station shutdown.

Stage 2 (removal of all plant and buildings outside the reactor biological shields): About £50 million. This will take a further five to seven years depending on the timing of Stage 3 (dismantlement of reactors and site clearance).

Stage 3: here, two operations have been considered—early decommissioning to follow immediately on Stage 2, completed within approximately 17 years after shutdown at a cost of £215 million; or deferment of reactor dismantlement for up to 100 years, at a cost of about £95 million.

Costs for packaging and transporting waste are notionally included in the above. Costs of disposal as such are excluded.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, for each year since 1979, the annual cost of research and development work on the decommissioning of nuclear power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Annual expenditure in the United Kingdom of research and development work on the decommissioning of nuclear power stations of all types is as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	2·3
1979-80	2·4
1980-81	3·2
1981-82	7·1
1982-83	6·2
1983-84	6·0
1984-85	6·1

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list and describe the research and development work done on the decommissioning of nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Much of the research and development work on decommissioning of nuclear power stations in this country has been in connection with the Windscale AGR project, and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 18 June at column 73. This work is expected to have wider benefits for the decommissioning of nuclear power stations generally.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the approximate total cost of research and development work on magnox nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Research and development on magnox stations has at various stages been carried out by the UKAEA, the CEGB and BNFL. The AEA spent about £20 million up to the mid-1960's when its magnox programme ended. The CEGB has spent some £80 million over the past 20 years. BNFL has spent £68 million in connection with magnox fuel fabrication and reprocessing since 1979.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a list showing for each licensed nuclear site containing a nuclear reactor that is no longer operational (a) the name of the site, (b) the name of the licence, (c) the type of nuclear reactor, (d) the date when it ceased to be operational, (e) the date when stage 1 decommissioning finished, or is planned to finish, (f) whether or not stage 3 decommissioning is planned, or has been completed and (g) if applicable, the date when stage 3 decommissioning finished, or is planned to finish.

Mr. Goodlad: The information is as follows:

	Licence No. 1	Licence No. 2	Licence No. 21	Licence No. 23
(a)	MERLIN, Aldermaston	JASON, Slough	QMC, Stepney	QMC, Newham

(c)	Low-powered research reactor.	Low-powered research reactor.	Low-powered research reactor.	Low-powered research reactor.
(d)	Shutdown August 1962.	Shutdown June 1961.	Shutdown October 1966.	Shutdown April 1982.
(e), (f) & (g)	Decommissioned 1962-63 and site returned to other uses. Licence surrendered December 1963.	Reactor moved to Royal Naval College Greenwich. Site returned to other uses. Licence surrendered January 1962.	Reactor moved to Newham (licence No. 23). Site returned to other uses. Licence surrendered March 1967.	Decommissioned 1982-83. Licence surrendered November 1983. Buildings now being converted for other uses.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information is available to his Department on the decommissioning of nuclear power stations in the United States; and if he will make a statement on American experience of decommissioning nuclear power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Details of nuclear power plant decommissioning in the United States of America have been published from time to time. Such details are freely available in this country and are believed to present a substantially complete picture of nuclear power plant decommissioning in the USA.

Experience of decommissioning in the USA is on a comparable scale to experience in the United Kingdom, although the reactor types involved are different. There is a useful interchange of information via the two main international agencies concerned with nuclear power, the Nuclear Energy Agency of the OECD and the International Atomic Energy Agency of the UN. This interchange is supplemented by direct contacts when appropriate.

Various research and prototype power reactors have been decommissioned in the USA. These include Elk River (BWR: 50 MWt) the site of which was cleared in the mid-1970s; and Shippingport (PWR: 70 MWe) which was shut down in 1982. Decommissioning is planned to be completed in 1988, and will include the complete removal of the reactor and the clearance from the site of all ancillary equipment and buildings except where these are designated for modification and re-use.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will describe the nuclear site licences, and the conditions attached to such licences, granted to the Central Electricity Generating Board in respect of magnox power stations; and if he will place in the Library a copy of a representative licence for one of the older magnox power stations, with a copy of the conditions attached.

Mr. Goodlad: A nuclear site licence defines the site and describes the plant. Licence conditions relate to management of the site, the safety of the plant and the safety of workers. A typical set of licence conditions is reproduced in the booklet "The Work of HM Nuclear Installations Inspectorate" which is available in the Library of the House. A copy of the licence relating to Dungeness, which includes a representative magnox power station, is also being placed in the Library.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the terms of the agreement made between Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and the licensees of magnox nuclear power stations providing for a review of each station's safety features and performance after 20 years of operation; and if he will place copies of the agreement in the Library.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the Health and Safety Commission that the arrangements for each long term review of magnox nuclear power stations are a matter for discussion between Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and the licensee concerned and take into consideration the age and operational history of the station.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, for each magnox nuclear power station that has reached 20 years of operation (a) the name of the power station, (b) the date that each reactor reached 20 years of operation, (c) the date of the relevant statutory shutdown of each reactor after 20 years of operation, (d) the date the licensee completed its 20-year review of the station's safety features and performance, (e) the date following (c) above when consent was given by the Health and Safety Executive for each reactor to be started up again, and (f) the date following (d) above when Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate completed its work on the licensee's 20-year review.

Mr. Goodlad: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate make it a condition of nuclear power station licences that all stations must be shut down every two years for maintenance and inspection. The station is not permitted to start up again until the NII is satisfied, in the light of this exercise, that it is safe for it to do so. In addition, it is a policy of the inspectorate that licensees should carry out a general safety review after a station has been operating for about 20 years which will enable longer term safety issues to be addressed. This review is not associated with any particular station shut-down, but its findings will be taken into account in considering a station's longer terms operation. The information is:

41. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide information on the thermal energy generated and spent fuel discharged by each of the Central Electricity Generating Board magnox reactors in the fiscal year 1984-85; and if he will update to 31 March the information on the allocation of plutonium produced in the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board magnox reactors given in reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 25 January, at columns 545-7.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 198-9]: The following table sets out the allocation or use of plutonium produced in the magnox reactors of the SSEB and CEGB at 31 March 1985.

Allocation of plutonium produced in CEGB or SSEB Magnox reactors (position at 31 March 1985)

	Tonnes (nearest 10 tonnes)
Plutonium in irradiated fuel
(a) Estimated in fuel in CEGB/SSEB Magnox reactors	910
(b) Estimated plutonium in fuel discharged from CEGB/SSEB Magnox reactors, but not yet reprocessed	4
Separated plutonium
(c) In stock at British Nuclear Fuels plc as oxide	21
(d) In process at British Nuclear Fuels plc in intermediate other forms (eg nitrate)	10
(e) Sold or leased to UKAEA for Fast Reactor R&D since 1969	5
(f) Exported for civil purposes to countries other than the US	10
Sub total	400
(g) Balance (see note (g) below)

Notes:

(a) These figures are derived from the known tonnage of fuel elements and their estimated overall average irradiation and cannot be accurately calculated.

(b) As for (a). About 25 per cent. of amount shown was held by BNFL.

(c) About 20 per cent. of amount shown was held by BNFL.

(g) The balance of plutonium produced in the boards' magnox reactors was consigned to the United States before 1971 under the United States/United Kingdom Defence Agreement, and as stated by the Prime Minister, on 21 April 1964, was used by United States for civil purposes. Because of the barter arrangements under which this plutonium was consigned, it would not be in the national interest to publish this figure.

Euratom Procedures

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied that Euratom procedures are adequate to enable the United Kingdom and other countries to comply with their obligations under the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom complies fully with its non-proliferation treaty obligations, and accepts IAEA safeguards under a voluntary offer. We are satisfied with Euratom procedures.

Uranium Export

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy for what purposes uranium was exported to Luxembourg; and what precautions were taken by the exporter to ensure that it was used for the purposes intended.

Mr. Goodlad: A quantity of approximately 42 tonnes of depleted uranium was exported by BNF plc to Luxembourg in March 1984 for use in the production of master alloys for steel making. The export was made under safeguards.

Oil Companies

Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his policy towards the future exercise of his powers to require oil companies who are partners in new oilfield developments to enter into participation agreements with the British National Oil Corporation or its successor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As I stated on Second Reading of the Oil and Pipelines Bill on 14 May at column 194, it is the Government's intention that as new oilfields reach the development stage, the licensees should continue to conclude agreements which enable the British National Oil Corporation or its successor, the Oil and Pipelines Agency, to participate in the oil produced. However, the agency may not, without the Secretary of State's consent, elect to take petroleum under such agreement.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Physiotherapy

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many physiotherapists have been employed at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast in each of the last three financial years for which records are available.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested, expressed in whole-time equivalent terms, is as follows:

	Number
1 April 1983	42·1
1 April 1984	39·3
1 April 1985	39·3

The current whole-time equivalent number is 38·1.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the level of proposed cutback in expenditure in the physiotherapy department at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast for 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Eastern health and social services board, but I understand that the physiotherapy department has been set a savings target of £65,330 for the current financial year.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if there will be any reduction in the number of physiotherapists presently employed at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast during 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Eastern health and social services board. However, I understand that no decision has yet been taken on whether staffing levels in the physiotherapy department at the Royal Victoria hospital will be reduced.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to seek to ensure that the standard of care for patients requiring physiotherapy at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast, is maintained and that staffing levels in the physiotherapy department are consistent with the required level of service.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Eastern health and social services board since the staffing levels for specific services at individual hospitals can only be determined in the light of local priorities and needs. I can, however, assure the hon. Gentleman that I share his interest in ensuring that standards of care for patients are maintained. I have therefore drawn his concern about this matter to the attention of the chairman of the Eastern board.

Southern Education and Library Board

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many pupils attended each secondary or grammar school in the Southern education and library board area in each of the last two years;

(2) how many pupils attended each primary school in the Southern education and library board area in each of the last two years.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

District Heating

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Housing Executive on the breakdown of charges made for district heating on the Springfarm estate, Antrim, including information as to the fuel, maintenance and other components of such charges.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 15 July 1985, c. 45]: I understand from the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that the current weekly budget charges for district heating in the Springfarm estate, Antrim, are as follows:

2 Person Dwelling	10·78
3 Person Dwelling	13·10
4 Person Dwelling	14·79
5-6 Person Dwelling	17·66

The average weekly budget charge is £15·57 and can be broken down as follows:

£1·59 standing charge — to cover transmission losses, heat management charges (including maintenance within the boilerhouse) electricity, rates, insurance and meter reading charges;
£1·60 hot water charge; and
£7·38 variable charge to cover heat consumption, based on fuel costs and an annual allowance for heat consumption.

EMPLOYMENT

Benefit Office, Denton

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many staff were employed at Denton unemployment benefit office, 68 Hyde Road, Denton, during the last 12 months; how many hours have been lost due to staff absence or due to illness or other reasons; how many hours overtime were worked; how many claimants per staff were dealt with; and what plans there are to change the staffing levels.

Mr. Alan Clark: Over the last 12 months 16 staff have been employed at Denton unemployment benefit office and there are no plans to change staffing levels. During the same period 3,807 hours were lost due to staff absence or illness; 512 hours of overtime were worked and on average each staff member dealt with 117 claimants.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have registered as willing to work, giving details of their skill and experience, at jobcentres covering the county of Cheshire at the most convenient date; and how many people were registered as unemployed for the purpose of benefit in the equivalent area at the same date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 7 June 1985 there were 16,638 job seekers registered for employment at jobcentres covering the county of Cheshire. Analysis of this figure by details of skills or experience is not available. It includes some employed people seeking a change of employment and some unemployed people not claiming benefits. Job seekers are no longer required to register at a job centre as a condition for receiving unemployment benefits; nor is it necessary to register for employment in order to use the jobcentre.

The number of unemployed persons claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits in the county of Cheshire on 13 June 1985 was 51,646. It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage quota of registered disabled staff currently employed by public sector employers, excluding Government Departments.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 1 June 1984, the latest date for which information is available, the approximate average was 0·9 per cent.

Health and Safety Inspectors

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many health and safety inspectors were allocated to the construction industry in January of each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers of health and safety inspectors allocated to inspection work in the construction industry were:

	Number
January:
1979	86
1980	87
1981	90
1982	89
1983	88
1984	88
1985	86

In addition, there are a number of inspectors in Her Majesty's factory inspectorate's construction national industry group and in other specialist branches of the Health and Safety Executive who are engaged in advisory and policy work related to the construction industry.

Average Weekly Income

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish figures to show the average weekly income in terms of modal range for (a) men and (b) women in employment in Great Britain in 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply on 26 November 1984, at column 382, for the latest information, which relates to full-time employees.

Discrimination

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he has any proposals to combat discrimination against lesbians and homosexual men in employment; and if he will make a statement.

(2) if he will detail the work done by his Department to combat discrimination against lesbians and homosexual men in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Wages Councils

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the percentage of the workers covered by each wages council who belong to a trade union.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Precise information is not available, but the indications from sources such as the new earnings survey, the workplace industrial relations survey and ACAS reports are that trade union members are commonly in a minority in wages council trades.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the existing procedures under which he may modify or abolish individual wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to sections 4 to 7 inclusive and schedule 1 to the Wages Councils Act 1979. Copies of the Act are available in the Library.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for wages councils as a whole, the number of independent members in each of the various backgrounds or occupations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The backgrounds of the 47 independent members of wages councils are as follows:

	Number
Industry and commerce	12
Public service (administration)	5
The professions	6
Education	23
Journalism	1

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment for each year since 1979, how many workers covered by wages councils had their pay checked; how many were found to be underpaid; and how many arrears was paid by employers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Workers whose pay was checked by visit	244,941	269,134	181,974	165,118	139,305	148,073
Workers whose pay was checked other than by visit	not available	26,357	23,830	162,509	193,548	268,821
Total	244,941	295,491	205,804	327,627	332,853	416,894
Workers found to be underpaid	23,223	29,314	25,482	20,406	20,832	18,048
Arrears paid	£1,511,760	£2,100,512	£2,037,930	£1,861,783	£1,860,110	£1,871,140

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions were made for failure to comply with a wages council order in each of the last six years; and for each year what was the average penalty imposed at 1985 prices.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Investigations resulting in prosecution and conviction	12	8	8	7	2	2
Average amount paid in fines at constant (June) 1985 prices	£177	£246	£466	£238	£208	£107

The wages inspectorate's policy, endorsed by successive Governments over many years, is to seek compliance with the legislation by advice and persuasion. Prosecution is considered only where the offence is deliberate or repeated and the evidence adequate.

The level of fines is a matter for the courts.

Steel Industry

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the percentage reduction in employment in the steel industry in the United Kingdom and in each of the member states of the European Economic Community since the beginning of 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available data are given in the following table. This shows the percentage changes in employment in the iron and steel industries of each of the member states of the European Coal and Steel Community between the end of 1978 and the end of 1983.

Change in employees (December 1978 to December 1983)

	Per cent.
Federal Republic of Germany	−19·3
France	−31·1
Italy	− 8·9
Netherlands	− 9·8
Belgium	−18·5

United Kingdom	−61·5
Ireland	− 5·9
Denmark	−34·3

Youth Training Scheme

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the extra funds which he promised to make available for encouraging extended periods of training to school leavers under the youth training scheme will be used to promote further schemes in the west midlands region.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1985]: No decisions have been taken, but the allocation of Government money for the youth training scheme between different geographical areas will continue to take account, after the extension of the scheme, of the needs of industry and the demand for training places.

SCOTLAND

Job Sharing

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many job-sharing schemes are currently operating within local authorities in Scotland; and how many people are involved in job sharing.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Within Scottish local authorities at 16 July 1985 there were three job-splitting schemes operating in which six people were participating. At the same date there were 80 people in total participating in 40 job-splitting schemes throughout Scotland.

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what job-sharing schemes he is promoting among his Department's staff; and how many Scottish staff are involved in job sharing.

Mr. Younger: Although my Department has no formal job-sharing scheme, there are four posts the work of which is shared among eight staff.

House Condition Survey

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will bring forward a housing condition survey.

Mr. Ancram: No. My right hon. Friend has yet to be convinced that the results of a national house condition survey would justify the very considerable effort and cost involved.

Bypasses

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he now expects the Edinburgh outer city bypass to be completed; and what is his estimate of the effect on traffic within the city.

Mr. Ancram: This project is the responsibility of Lothian regional council. I understand that it hopes to complete work on the remaining sections of the bypass broadly within the decade.

The bypass will reduce through traffic within the northern, southern and western suburbs of the city and will provide a more direct link from proposed industrial developments in the Esk valley, east Edinburgh and Musselburgh with the west.

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce the line for the Dumfries bypass.

Mr. Younger: I expect to make a decision on the preferred route for the Dumfries bypass, and to publish a draft trunk road order, in the autumn.

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce the result of the Annan bypass inquiry.

Mr. Younger: Part I of the report on the Annan bypass public local inquiry was circulated on 18 July and comments are due to be returned to the inquiry reporter by mid-August. Until the report is completed and the reporter's recommendations have been considered I cannot announce a decision, but I hope to do so before the end of the year.

Earnings

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give figures to show for 1984 the average level of earnings in terms of modal range for (a) men aged 21 years or over in Scotland and (b) women aged 18 years or over in Scotland; and how these averages compare with the mean level of earnings for both groups during that period.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave him on 26 November 1984, at column 373, relating to adult male and female employees at April 1984. No subsequent estimates are yet available.

Scottish Agricultural Organisation Society

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been paid to the Scottish Agricultural Organisation Society Ltd. in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: Payments made by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland to the Scottish Agricultural Organisation Society Ltd. for the promotion and development of agricultural and horticultural co-operation are shown in the table. The remainder of the society's income, representing a little under half of the total, is derived from members subscriptions, fees and accumulated interest.

Financial Year	£
1980-81	84,000
1981-82	96,000
1982-83	115,000
1983-84	105,000
1984-85	123,000

Islands Councils (Montgomery Committee Report)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the report of the committee of inquiry into the functions and powers of the islands councils of Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I have now completed my consideration of this report. Of the 49 recommendations which the committee has made, I accept 37 of them, a few with some qualifications, and I have already implemented a further one. I have today placed in the Library a copy of a statement giving my detailed response to each recommendation.

Electricity Boards (Financing Limits)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the external financing limits for the Scottish electricity boards in the current financial year.

Mr. Younger: I propose to make the following changes in the external financing limits of the two Scottish electricity boards in 1985-86.

	SSEB £ million	NSHEB £ million
Previous limit	191·0	+9·2
Revised limit	238·2	−19·0
Change	+47·2	−28·2

These new limits take account of the knock-on effects of the miners' strike and provide for a rephasing of expenditure on Torness power station. They also take account of the need for a financial adjustment between the boards following the South of Scotland Electricity Board's revision in 1984-85 of its nuclear and coal-fired power station asset lives, which has no net effect on the total of their EFLs. The net increase in EFLs of £19 million is being charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the public expenditure planning total.

PRIME MINISTER

Argentina

Q39. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what response Her Majesty's Government have had from the Government of Argentina to the United Kingdom action of Monday 8 July, ending the ban on Argentine goods entering Britain; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Argentine Government's statement of 10 July described our action as a "positive act". But it went on to reiterate their insistence on British agreement to discuss sovereignty as a pre-condition for discussion of practical measures to improve bilateral relations. This is, of course, unacceptable. We look to them to make a more constructive response to our initiative.

Bearsden

Q89. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Bearsden.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

President Ortega

Mr. Corbyn asked the Prime Minister if she will place copies of her correspondence with President Ortega of Nicaragua in the Official Report.

The Prime Minister: It is not my practice to publish my correspondence with other Heads of State or Government.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 July.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister to what she attributes the variation between Ministers in the time taken to reply to hon. Members' correspondence; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The information requested by the hon. Member could be obtained only at disproportionate costs. All Departments receive a very large volume of ministerial correspondence. In all cases Ministers will make efforts to reply quickly. The information which I have available indicates that questions from hon. Members are dealt with with reasonable expedition, although inevitably the time taken varies depending upon such factors as the amount of research required and the number of people who need to be consulted.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister what arrangements are being made by Departments to seek to ensure that hon. Members' correspondence is dealt with timeously during the summer recess; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is the aim of Ministers to respond with appropriate dispatch and priority to correspondence from hon. Members at all times.

So far as is possible the normal departmental arrangements for dealing with correspondence will be applied during the recess. Where this is not possible each Department will adjust these arrangements to meet its particular circumstances and to maintain an effective service.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received in connection with the publication of the Green Paper "Building Societies: A New Framework", concerning the practice whereby certain building societies intervene when applications are made by their members to borrow funds from another source secured by a second charge by refusing to give consent to the registration of the charge and offer to tend money themselves for purposes unconnected with house purchase or home improvement; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that his proposed new legislation will include a code of practice to ensure fair competition for the provision of financial services;

(2) if, in considering the response he has received concerning the Green Paper, "Building Societies: A New Framework", he will make it his policy to ensure that his proposed new legislation will prohibit building societies and local authorities from operating a blanket refusal policy which prevents the registration of a second charge where a member wishes to secure a loan from another lender; and if he will ensure that competition for the provision of financial services is fair to all sectors of the financial market.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have received a number of representations concerning the practice by some building societies of restricting entry by borrowers into a second mortgage. I am advised, however, that it is the exception rather than the rule for a borrower to require the society's consent to a second mortgage, and even more unusual for consent to be refused. There have been no recent complaints to either the Office of Fair Trading or the Building Societies Association about prohibitions on second charges, and in the light of this I have no plans for adding to the present system of controls on societies or local authorities.

Transfer of Assets

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will use his powers under the Bank of England Act to require the banks to supply information concerning the transfer of assets abroad by United Kingdom residents to facilitate the collection of tax due on the income earned from such assets.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I am advised that neither the Treasury's nor the Bank of England's powers under the Bank of England Act 1946 could be used for this purpose.

Corporation Tax

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total corporation tax received from companies whose main activities is the manufacture of cider for each of the last five financial years.

Mr. Moore: I regret that this information is not available.

Tax Arrears (Remission)

Mrs. Currie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there has been any further review of the income limits which govern the Inland Revenue's practice for remitting arrears of tax which have arisen through official error.

Mr. Moore: Yes. The Inland Revenue's practice of remitting tax in cases of official error is set out in a White Paper of July 1971 (Cmnd. 4729), under which the proportion of arrears collected varies according to the size of the taxpayer's gross income; the balance of the arrear is remitted. The scale has been revised several times since 1971; the current scale, introduced in July 1984, is as follows:

Gross income	Percentage of arrears
	Collected	Remitted
Not above £8,000	None	All
£8,000 but not above £10,000	0·25	0·75
£10,000 but not above £12,500	0·50	0·50
£12,500 but not above £15,000	0·75	0·25
£15,000 but not above £21,500	0·90	0·10
£21,500	All	None

It has been decided to increase these limits. The new scale of limits will apply to arrears of tax, the actual or likely amount of which is first notified to the taxpayer or his agent on or after today. The date of notification will also be the date for testing eligibility for the pensioners' limits.

The scale generally applicable will be:

Gross income	Percentage of arrears
	Collected	Remitted
Not above £8,500	None	All
£8,500 but not above £10,500	0·25	0·75
£10,500 but not above £13,500	0·50	0·50
£13,500 but not above £16,000	0·75	0·25
£16,000 but not above £23,000	0·90	0·10
£23,000	All	None

In the case of taxpayers aged 65 or over or who are in receipt of the National Insurance retirement or widows' pension each of the above limits will be £2,500 greater. If a taxpayer in this category has gross income of £11,000 or less the whole of the arrears will be remitted, whilst some remission will be allowed on gross income up to £25,500.

Rates

Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 22 May 1985 to the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) Official Report, columns 472 and 473, what procedure will be followed by the Inland Revenue in assessing to tax the benefit of employer-provided accommodation in Scotland following the recent rating revaluation there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: As I announced on 22 May, the measure of the value of accommodation provided by reason of employment is in certain circumstances taken to be the property's gross rateable value. The recent rating revaluation in Scotland will mean that gross rateable values in Scotland will be considerably higher than those in England and Wales or Northern Ireland for equivalent properties.

To avoid unfairness as between taxpayers in different parts of the United Kingdom, the Inland Revenue has decided not to follow the practice of assessing the benefit arising on property in Scotland in strict accordance with the recent rating revaluation figures, while the future of rating revaluations is under consideration. Instead, the Inland Revenue will by concession use the existing 1978 figures as the basis of assessment for existing properties for 1985-86 and 1986-87. For 1987-88 and subsequent years and for new properties the Inland Revenue will scale back the 1985 figures by the average increase in rateable values in Scotland between 1978 and 1985 (170 per cent.).

Details of the treatment of employer-provided accommodation will be published in the Board of Inland Revenue's published list of extra-statutory concessions in due course. A copy of the Inland Revenue press release giving full details of the concession will be placed in the Library.

EC (Finance)

Mr. William Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total payments by the United Kingdom to European Economic Community funds from 1 January 1973 to 31 December 1984 showing the body to which the payments were made and including payments to the European Investment Bank and the European Coal and Steel Community, and also showing the total amounts the United Kingdom has received from these bodies in the same period in (a) loans and (b) grants.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1985, c. 446]: The information set out below includes the latest estimates of our gross contributions to and receipts from the European Economic Community, and our transactions with the European Investment Bank (EIB) and the European Atomic Energy Authority (EURATOM) for 1984. Information on transactions with the European Coal and Steel Community for 1984 is not currently available.

European Communities Budget (ECB)	£ million
1973-1984
UK gross contributions	17,895
UK receipts including refunds	12,500
European Investment Bank (EIB)
UK payments to capital	138
UK payments to reserves	20
UK loans from EIB own resources*	3,338
UK loans from New Community instrument* †	172
UK loans from EURATOM* †—46 mecu (received in 1983—some £27 million converted at the appropriate budget exchange rate)
There are no grants from the EIB or EURATOM.
European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC)
1973-1983
ECSC loans to UK*	1,608
ECSC grants to UK* ‖	262
Industrial levies paid to ECSC‡ by the UK coal and steel industries—1981 to 1983—86·24 mecu (some £48 million when converted at the appropriate annual average exchange rates)

* Total of loans and grants received from European Community institutions from 1 January 1983 to 31 December 1984. These are not the amounts currently outstanding.

† Under the New Community Instrument the European Commission borrows on the international capital markets in its own name and on-lends within the European Community, using the EIB as Administrator. The EURATOM loan scheme was set up in 1977. This scheme also is administered by the EIB, which customarily co-finances the project from its own resources, within the constraint that total Community involvement should not exceed 50 per cent. The remaining funds are raised by borrowing on the international capital markets. The moneys are lent to member states.

‡ The resources of the ECSC are financed partly out of the budget of the European Economic Community and partly by levies received from the Coal and Steel industries of the member states, based on a percentage of their production. Details of member states' individual levy payments were not published by the ECSC prior to 1981.

‖ Commitments undertaken by the ECSC to make awards of grant to the UK during the period 1973 to 1983, outturn in calendar years is not readily available.

Note: In addition to the payments listed in the table the UK also makes payments to the Community's Joint European Torus project by virtue of its host status—currently around £7 million per year. This project was started in 1978.

DEFENCE

HMS Coventry

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if diving operations for documents and strategic material in the wreck of HMS Coventry have now been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: As the hon. Member was told on 15 November 1982 (Official Report, column 44), naval divers were deployed to recover classified equipment and documents from the wreck of HMS Coventry. This work was successfully completed later that year.

CERN Ranges

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will consider the extention of the consultation period of the Cavanagh report on the CERN ranges.

Mr. Butler: The trade unions have been given a little over two months in which to comment on our consultative document on this report which I believe to be adequate.

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what savings his Department expects to make with the contracting out of the work of the Royal Aircraft Establishment ranges.

Mr. Butler: I assume the hon. Gentleman is referring to certain recommendations in the Cavanagh report on CERN ranges. No estimates of savings from further contractorisation are available. The report in question recommended that there should be an examination of the feasibility and cost-effectiveness of such a course as well as making recommendations on the management, organisation and loading of the ranges and it is currently the subject of consultation with the trades unions. Only when this process is complete will it be possible to decide whether or not to go ahead with the recommended examination.

Procurement Contracts

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the total procurement contracts awarded by his Department in the last year have gone to small firms.

Mr. Butler: The information available indicates that the proportions, by value, of the total procurement expenditure by my Department directly with small firms in the financial year 1983-84 (the only year for which information is at present available) were as follows:

Firms with up to 50 employees—approximately 4 per cent.

Firms with up to 200 employees — approximately 10 per cent.

These percentages do not take account of the significant amount of work awarded to small firms on a sub-contract basis.

Helicopters (Queen's Flight)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many helicopters are currently in service with the Queen's Flight.

Mr. Butler: The Queen's Flight is equipped with two Wessex helicopters.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the age of the current helicopters of the Queen's Flight.

Mr. Butler: The Wessex helicopters of the Queen's Flight were manufactured in 1969.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any plans to replace the helicopters of the Queen's Flight.

Mr. Butler: There are no plans to replace the helicopters of the Queen's Flight, which have many years' safe and useful operating life left.

Research Establishments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the staffing levels which have been employed in research establishments for which his Department is responsible in each single year since 1979.

Mr. Butler: Staffing levels in the research establishment of the procurement executive of the Ministry of Defence have been as follows:

	Non-industrial	Industrial	MOD Police	Total
1 April 1979	14,591	13,155½	—	27,746½
1 April 1980	14,447½	12,737	—	27,184½
1 April 1981	13,471½	12,228	—	25,699½
1 April 1982	12,739	11,773	—	24,512
1 April 1983	12,487½	10,887½	—	23,375
1 April 1984	12,123½	10,349	576	23,048½
1 April 1985	11,194½	9,370½	589	21,154

Note: Before 1 April 1984 MOD police numbers were not attributed to the research establishments.

Undergraduates

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the numbers of undergraduate students at universities who have received financial support from his Department for their courses in each academic year since 1979-80; if he will give a breakdown of the academic faculties and the individual universities in which they studied; and what specific new awards he plans to introduce for students of science-related disciplines.

Mr. Butler: My Department is planning to increase substantially from the start of the coming academic year the number of sponsorships it offers to students reading for first degrees in engineering, scientific and related disciplines. Our student engineer scheme, through which we recruit most of our professional engineers, will have its capacity doubled to sponsor up to about 140 undergraduates each year. We are, in addition, introducing a new scheme on the lines of the student engineer scheme to provide sponsorship for up to 100 undergraduates reading for science degrees in disciplines relevant to the Department's work programmes. I shall write to the hon. Member about the statistical information she has asked for as soon as possible.

Joint Research Scheme

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria will be used for determining successful or unsuccessful applications for grants submitted by universities to his Department for research in areas of potential strategic interest within the framework of the £10 million joint research scheme to be administered in co-operation with the Science and Engineering Research Council; and why universities have been given until 1 December to submit such applications.

Mr. Butler: Applications for grants under this scheme will be assessed by the relevant research council against their usual criteria and by the Ministry of Defence for relevance to defence, following initial submission to the former. No date has yet been announced for the first tranche of applications but a reasonable time span is clearly needed for documentation inviting applications to be prepared, and for academic institutions to consider what response to make. Up to £5 million will be made available for the scheme.

Recruitment

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons were recruited in Scotland for each of the armed services during 1984-85; and if he will break down the figures by careers information office areas.

Mr. Lee: The numbers of service personnel recruited at careers information offices in Scotland between 1 April 1984 and 31 March 1985 are set out in the following table. These figures exclude the recruitment of officers and Queen Alexandra's Royal Navy Nursing Service who are recruited centrally.

CIO	RN/RM	Army	RAF	All Services
Aberdeen	34	117	109	260
Dundee	51	406	107	564
Edinburgh	130	547	117	794
Glasgow	179	1,099	234	1,512
Inverness	102	162	—*	264
Total	496	2,331	567	3,394

* Attestations of entrants to the RAF from the Inverness CIO were made at Aberdeen and are included in the Aberdeen numbers.

US Service Men

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States service men are stationed at (a) Machrihanish, (b) Holy Loch, (c) Edzell and (d) Thurso.

Mr. Lee: Information on the number of United States service personnel at these facilities is compiled annually. As at October 1984, the figures were as follows:

	Number
Machrihanish	95
Holy Loch	1,821
Edzell	731
Thurso	156

Levene Report

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the Levene report on defence procurement to be published.

Mr. Lee: It is not proposed to publish the report on defence equipment procurement which Mr. Levene prepared last year when he was personal adviser to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, as this was an internal management document.

HMS Euryalus

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the refitting of HMS Euryalus and, in particular (a) the cost comparison with the royal dockyard and (b) damage done to component parts of the frigate during the refit.

Mr. Lee: The cost of the refit of HMS Euryalus, in terms of the price paid to the contractor and the other expenses incurred by Ministry of Defence, will be compared on an equitable basis with that of the similar refit of HMS Arethusa at Devonport dockyard. There has been no untoward damage to Euryalus during her refit; recent publicity related to a weapon launcher supplied to the contractor that was found to be defective on setting to work.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish all the figures available to him of the range of estimated savings and costs for (a) transitional arrangements and (b) year-to-year expenses in the running of the royal dockyards under a private agency-management scheme; and what is the assumed profit margin for the contractor.

Mr. Lee: It would not be appropriate to disclose the details of the estimates which have been made because this would prejudice future negotiations with contractors should commercial management be adopted. However, taking account of the initial implementation costs of some £60 million, our most recent assessment is that annual savings would amount to some £25 million rising to some £29 million-£33 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has calculated the sum of money required to set up a pension fund for royal dockyard employees in the event of a franchise arrangement for the dockyards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No. Broad estimates have been made but the Department would take actuarial advice on the precise level of funding required for any new pensions arrangements for royal dockyard employees.

Klaus Barbie

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in the light of the publication in France of the report, "L'affreux Secret", by John Loftus, United States Justice Department special investigator, he will reconsider his decision not to make available to the Public Record Office his Department's file on Klaus Barbie.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the right hon. Member.

Defence Projects (Completion Delays)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish in the Official Report those projects which, as a direct result of inefficiency by Devonport or Rosyth dockyards, have not been completed to time, cost and quality during the last 10 years or any suitable period.

Mr. Lee: Inefficiency can arise from a number of factors — for example material shortages, inadequate work specifications, restrictive work practices, weaknesses in planning and control, late changes to the refit requirements or to the overall dockyard programme—some of which are within and some outside the dockyard's direct control. Ships are only accepted back into service when quality standards have been met, but timekeeping and costs suffer as a result of such inefficiencies. During the past five years (the period for which information is readily available) some two thirds of refits have exceeded time and cost estimates, although for the latter inflation would also have been a contributory factor.

Parliamentary Maritime Group

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he learnt of the invitation by the parliamentary maritime group to Sir John Fieldhouse to address a meeting of the group; what consideration he gave to this request; why he has not agreed to this request; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hesseltine: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Dockyards

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he plans to close, or reduce staffing at, the chief executive royal dockyards headquarters in Bath.

Mr. Lee: The defence open government document 85/01 published in April re-affirmed the view that the Ministry of Defence and the dockyards should establish a clear customer/supplier relationship. It is therefore planned that the headquarters of the chief executive royal dockyards in Bath be progressively superseded by new customer organisation which will draw on the existing staff.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the manpower reductions at Rosyth and Devonport dockyards since May 1979.

Mr. Lee: From May 1979 to April 1985 civilian manpower at Rosyth and Devonport dockyards has increased by 313 and 353 respectively.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish a list in the Official Report of those organisations and individuals who responded to open government document 85/01, "The Future of the Royal Dockyards"; and which of those expressed concern about the time available for consultations.

Mr. Lee: Of some 60 representations received in the Department from members of the public on subjects relating to the future of the royal dockyards, one expressed concern at the period allowed for consultation. Twelve of these were presented as submissions in response to the open government document 85/01, of which none expressed this concern.

In addition, formal responses to the Document have been received directly from six local authorities and institutions:

Plymouth City Council (which also forwarded the views of a number of other authorities)
Borough of West Devon
Devon County Council
Plymouth Chamber of Commerce and Industry
Fife Regional Council
Dunfermline District Council

Four of the six expressed concern at the consultative period. There have also been responses from the Shipbuilding Trades' Joint Council (trade union side), the Ministry of Defence Council of Civil Service Unions, and the Trades Union Congress, all of which express such concern.

Finally, there has been a continuing expression of interest from industry.

Maritime Services Organisation

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for changes to the Marine Services Organisation.

Mr. Lee: A management audit of the Marine Services Organisation was completed recently. The audit acknowledged that the standard of service provided is high; that the marine services undertake important operational tasks; and that a viable in-house organisation needs to be retained for the future. However, its principal findings were that there was substantial scope for improving the efficiency of the marine services and that there was a prima facie case for contracting out the bulk of the operations. A consultative document detailing the audit's findings is being issued to the trade unions today and a copy will be placed in the Library of both Houses. There will be full consultation before major decisions on implementation are reached. However, in the meantime, management's aim must be to ensure that efficiency is improved substantially and costs reduced, while still meeting the essential operational needs of the Fleet. Implementation of necessary changes would be phased over three years and directed by a steering group.

Orangeleaf

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has reached a decision on the contractor for conversion of Royal Fleet auxiliary Orangeleaf to the support tanker role; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: A number of tenders for this work were received. The contract is being awarded to Tyne Shiprepair Ltd. This firm's tender offered significant advantages over its nearest competitors' in terms of both price and time.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the amounts of long-term development aid supplied by the United Kingdom to Ethiopia over the last four years and projected levels for the next two years; how this compares with other EEC and other major world donors; and if he will further express these total figures as per capita figures, for Ethiopia, and per capita figures for donor countries, respectively.

Mr. Raison: The details of our bilateral long-term development aid to Ethiopia over the last four years are as follows:

1981	144
1982	106
1983	32
1984	170

These figures include project aid, technical co-operation and debt cancellation, but exclude disaster relief and aid channelled through the European Community, the world food programme and other multilateral agencies. We are aiming to spend about £500,000 this year, mainly on technical co-operation, and the level of future aid is currently under consideration.

Details of total net official development assistance, including per capita figures, to Ethiopia by the United Kingdom and other western donors, for 1980 to 1983, as reported to the Development Assistance Committee of the OECD are given below. The 1984 statistics are not yet available. Under the DAC reporting system, these statistics include food aid and emergency relief. Comparative figures for long-term development aid alone are not available.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the amount of grain that has arrived in Ethiopia from each developed country in the last six months; how far this is short of Ethiopia's needs; and in which month in the coming months each country's promised delivery is likely to arrive in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Information on deliveries made and planned is contained on pages 40-41 of the latest status report number 12 dated 1 July 1985 from the world food programme's Africa task force secretariat. I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

The total amount delivered in the first six months in 1985—some 650,000 tonnes—covered half the annual need estimated by the United Nations famine relief co-ordinator.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has regarding the present level of grain stock at Assab and Mossawa in Ethiopia and in Djibouti; and how these levels compare with stocks in each of the last six months.

Mr. Raison: Information from the world food programme Africa task force secretariat is that present levels are:

	Tonnes (landed)
Assab	76,000
Massawa	25,000
Djibouti	31,000

Stocks in each of the last six months were (tonnes):

	January	February	March April May June

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information there is as to the most recent estimates of the amount of grain that will arrive at the port of Assab in Ethiopia in each of the next eight weeks, and as to how much will be in store at the port in each of those weeks.

Mr. Raison: The latest information from the world food programme Africa task force secretariat is that on 14 July there were on the quay in Assab 76,000 tonnes of grain and offshore 61,000 tonnes (including 25,000 tonnes of commercially imported grain). A further 17,000 tonnes are expected in the week 14-20 July.

Shipping arrangements are made by donors in close consultation with the world food programme on a monthly basis; in July some 95,000 tonnes are scheduled with a similar amount for August depending on port capacity in Ethiopia.

The amount in store at port will depend on the level of offtake from the port which is currently 2,500 to 3,000 tonnes each day on average.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many aircraft have been supplied by the British Government and European Governments, respectively, for famine relief in Ethiopia during the last 12 months.

Mr. Raison: As well as the two RAF aircraft stationed in Ethiopia since November 1984, which have been supported by a weekly Hercules resupply flight, we have helped to pay for 12 other aircraft on special charter flights to move food and other relief supplies to and within Ethiopia.

According to the latest information, other European Governments have supplied aircraft at various times during the last 12 months as follows:

Country
Belgium	4 including 2 for use by the International Committee for the Red Cross
Bulgaria	4 including 2 helicopters
France	1
Federal Republic of Germany	2
German Democratic Republic	4
Italy	2
Poland	Red Cross helicopters—numbers uncertain
Sweden	1 for use by International Committee for the Red Cross
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	Possibly 36 including 24 helicopters, used mainly for the resettlement programme

UNESCO

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the representations made to him concerning the proposed United Kingdom withdrawal from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation; and if he will place copies of all such representations in the Library.

Mr. Raison: It is not the practice to reveal details of correspondence from private individuals or organisations without their consent.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions on which he or other Ministers have met representatives of the Heritage Foundation to discuss the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation; and if he will place in the Library copies of the representations made by that organisation.

Mr. Raison: I received Mr. Owen Harries, John Molin Fellow of the Heritage Foundation, twice in 1984 and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has met him once informally.

There have been no written representations from this organisation.

Sudan

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid has been given to Sudan since June 1984.

Mr. Raison: We have provided £26·3 million as a long-term development assistance to the Sudan since June 1984. In addition, we have given over £23 million in emergency famine relief since October 1984.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Appraisal and Promotion)

11. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now introduce legislation to provide for a system of regular appraisal for teachers and promotion based upon such appraisal.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government will be taking an early opportunity to seek the power to require local education authorities regularly to appraise the performance of their teachers. I would like to see more good teachers promoted to higher scales and those promotion decisions put onto the more consistent and reliable basis facilitated by an appraisal system.

51. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he is making with his plans to improve the quality and the career structure of teachers.

53. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress there has been towards relating teachers' pay and promotion to merit and performance.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have had some discussions with the local authority associations on my letter of 21 May which set out the Government's proposals for making progress towards these objectives. I have also discussed some of the issues arising with the Assistant Masters' and Mistresses' Association, the National Association of Headteachers and the Secondary Heads Association. I shall continue to urge the parties to negotiate on these proposals which would enable local authorities to offer substantially improved career and promotion prospects based on consideration of all the relevant factors such as teachers' qualifications, skills and experience, the quality of the work done and the demands of particular teaching posts and the difficulty of filling them.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

12. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he will take to ensure the change over to the general certificate of secondary education in September.

Mr. Dunn: The first GCSE courses will begin in September 1986, and the first GCSE examinations will be held in 1988. In preparation, there is to be a special programme of in-service training for all GCSE teachers during the 1985-86 academic year, to which the Government are making a substantial financial contribution. We continue to discuss with the examining groups and the secondary examinations council their developing plans for the introduction of the new examination courses.

Schools (Parental Choice)

22. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the operation of the provisions relating to choice of schools contained in the Education Act 1980.

Mr. Dunn: Yes.

Mature Students

23. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to improve access to further and higher education for mature students.

Mr. Brooke: Mature candidates compete on equal terms for places in further and higher education alongside younger candidates. All those who are eligible should be able to find a place. For higher education the recent Green Paper (Cmnd. 9524) redefines the guidelines for determining access to place greater emphasis on the intellectual competence, motivation and maturity of the student in a way that should benefit the mature candidate without formal qualifications (paragraphs 3.1-3.3). The Green Paper also draws attention to the value of access courses for older candidates aspiring to higher education (paragraph 6.9). The projections of demand for higher education underlying the Government's expenditure plans allow for increasing numbers of mature entrants to higher education as the relevant age groups increase with the onward movement of the population bulge.

Teachers (Pay Dispute)

24. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has reached a conclusion on whether to seek to change the machinery for the determination of teachers' pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: No. I am giving the most careful consideration to recent developments and their implications for the current negotiating machinery.

25. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to meet representatives of the teachers' side of the Burnham committee to discuss the teachers' dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

30. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is considering any new initiative to seek to solve the teachers' dispute.

34. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current teachers' pay dispute.

35. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

50. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current teachers' pay dispute.

52. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the current situation of the teachers' pay dispute.

56. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current situation in the teachers' pay dispute.

57. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the recent developments on the question of teachers' salaries.

58. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current position of the teachers' dispute.

60. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current state of negotiations over the future of teachers' pay and conditions of work.

62. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for settling the teachers' dispute before the commencement of the next school year.

68. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what initiatives he plans to take as a contribution to settling the teachers' dispute before the commencement of the next school year.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what initiatives he plans to take as a contribution to settling the teachers' pay dispute before the commencement of the next school year.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), my hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and Banbury (Mr. Baldry), the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand), my hon. Friend the Member for Crayford and Erith (Mr. Evennett), the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor).

47. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the chairman of Cambridgeshire county council education committee about the teachers' dispute since the local authority elections in May.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have recently received a letter dated 16 July from the chairman of the Cambridgeshire education committee. It recommends the introduction of pendulum arbitration and a more precise contract for teachers linking pay with other conditions of employment.

School Buildings

26. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to issue guidance to local education authorities about the level of resources devoted to the maintenance and repair of school buildings.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's plans for 1985-86, published in Cmnd. 9428, allow for improved levels of expenditure per pupil on repairs and maintenace in many authorities. In addition, the Department's design note 40 on "Maintenance and Renewal in Education Buildings: Needs and Priorities" published earlier this year, provides guidelines to LEAs for determining maintenance priorities and setting up cost-effective maintenance programmes. My right hon. Friend has no plans to issue further guidance.

66. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will conduct a survey of the condition of school buildings in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so. School buildings in other parts of the United Kingdom are the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales.

Adult Education

27. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what financial support has been given to adult education in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Sir Keith Joseph: Expenditure in England by local education authorities on adult education centres and by central government on adult education grants and programmes has been £69 million, £77 million, £88 million, £102 million and £104 million respectively for the financial years in question. The figure for 1984-85 is the estimated outturn expenditure.

Church and Independent Schools

28. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to encourage the growth of church and independent schools.

Mr. Dunn: No encouragement is needed. The Government welcome the diversity such schools bring to our education system subject, in the case of voluntary church schools, to the efficient use of public money.

Teaching Profession

29. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many people left the teaching profession other than through retirement during 1984-85.

Sir Keith Joseph: The latest figures available are for 1983-84 when 20,260 teachers left maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales prior to age 60 on grounds other than premature retirement. This figure represents 4·9 per cent. of the teaching force, a proportion which has remained fairly steady since 1982-83 after falling gradually from a level of 6·3 per cent. in 1979-80.

16 to 19-year-olds

31. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provision is planned for the financial support of 16 to 19-year-olds in full-time education.

64. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about financial provision for 16 to 19-year-olds.

Sir Keith Joseph: Young people in non-advanced full-time education have traditionally been regarded as primarily dependent on their parents for financial support until their 19th birthday. Parents receive child benefit in respect of such children, and in addition local education authorities have discretionary powers to pay grants and allowances to those in need.

Education Budget

32. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science in what areas of the education budget he is seeking to make economies.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am concerned that the resources available for education generally should be used economically and effectively throughout the service. For example, the Government's plans for education expenditure by LEAs in 1985-86 assume economies in the provision of the school meals service, in caretaking and cleaning and through continuing progress in the removal of surplus school places, so as to target resources to best educational effect. These and other opportunities for efficiency savings will be no less crucial in later years for which provision for education, like other aspects of public spending, is currently under review as part of the annual survey.

Grammar Schools

33. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he yet has figures for the number of maintained grammar schools in England in January 1985.

Mr. Dunn: There were 171 maintained grammar schools in England in January 1985.

18 to 19-year-olds

36. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of 18 to 19-year-olds in the United Kingdom entered higher education in 1978 and in 1984.

Mr. Brooke: Information is not readily available in the form requested. The Department's usual way of monitoring participation in higher education is the age participation index. This is defined as the number of full-time and sandwich home initial entrants to higher education aged under 21 expressed as a percentage of the average population of 18 and 19-year-olds. Initial entrants are those entering a higher education course for the first time and excludes those entering a second such course. The index for Great Britain in 1978 was 12·3 (excluding entrants to teacher training courses with less than 2 A levels); the provisional estimate for 1984 is 13·7.

Oxford and Cambridge Universities

37. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost to public funds of college fees paid in respect of students at Oxford and Cambridge universities.

Mr. Brooke: An estimate based on average college fees and numbers of home students (not all of whom will have their fees paid from public funds) suggests that the cost to public funds of college fees in the academic year 1984-85 is approximately £19·5 million for students at the University of Oxford and approximately £17 million for students at the University of Cambridge.

General Teachers Council

38. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received towards the establishment of a General Teachers Council.

Sir Keith Joseph: In 1982 I received requests from the Campaign for a General Teaching Council, the Joint Council of Heads and the Professional Association of Teachers for an inquiry into the possible establishment of a council. Right hon. and hon. Members and others have inquired from time to time about my views on the case for a council. I have replied that I would need to be convinced that such proposals commanded wide support and safeguarded the interests of producers and consumers alike, before the Government could consider whether to support the establishment of a council.

Church Schools

39. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future capital funding of church schools.

Mr. Dunn: We shall continue to ensure that an equitable share of the total resources available for education capital expenditure is used to grant aid approved capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools.

Community Education

40. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the development of community education.

Mr. Dunn: It is for local education authorities to decide on the pattern of educational provision locally, including the extent to which educational buildings might be used for community purposes. My right hon. Friend does, however, encourage local authorities to promote the shared use of school premises so far as resources permit.

Burnham Committee

41. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met members of the Burnham committee; and what was discussed.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is not my practice to meet members of the Burnham committee in their capacity as members of that committee. I have, however, had meetings recently with a number of the organisations represented on the committee, including the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and three teachers' associations. Most of the discussion concerned teachers' pay, pay structure and related matters.

Agricultural Research Budget

42. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further representations he has received about the proposed cuts in the agricultural research budget.

Mr. Brooke: On 22 January 1985 my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced at column 401 a proposed reduction in the public expenditure provision for research, development and advisory services funded by the Agriculture Departments in 1986-87 and 1987-88. These reductions reflect the Government's aim that those who benefit from such work should contribute in greater measure to its costs.

Following the announcement we have received representations from the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council (AFRC) concerning the possible consequences for the AFRC and particularly for the research it conducts using funds from the Department's science budget. The Department has also received 22 letters from hon. Members and other interested parties directly, or via the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

16-plus Examination

43. Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the first merit and distinction certificates at 16-plus to be awarded.

Mr. Dunn: The Department issued a consultation paper on GCSE distinction and merit certificates in December 1984. Responses to that document are now being considered, and my right hon. Friend will make an announcement as soon as he is in a position to do so.

School Governing Bodies

44. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the legislative proposals for changing the composition of school governing bodies.

Mr. Dunn: At the first opportunity permitted by the Government's legislative programme.

Higher Education

45. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the approximate number of students in higher education engaged on (a) arts and humanities courses and (b) on courses in science, engineering and technology.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of home students enrolled on higher education courses in 1983-84, the latest year for which information is available, was as follows:

Great Britain

Subjects	Full-time and sandwich	*Part-time
Arts and humanities	303,500	101,400
Science, engineering and technology	216,300	134,000

* Excluding 76,000 Open University students of whom approximately half were following arts and humanities courses.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the Green Paper, The Development of Higher Education into the 1990s; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Although my right hon. Friend is beginning to receive representations on the issues raised in Cmnd. 9524, the majority are not expected until later in the year. Such representations will be taken into account in the further formulation of policy for the future development of higher education: the Government hope to be able to make a further statement of their intentions in 1986.

Education Costs

46. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current public expenditure on education per child; and what was the figure in 1983, 1981 and 1979, all at current prices.

Sir Keith Joseph: Local education authorities spent £915 per pupil in 1983-84, the latest period for which actual figures are available. The corresponding figures for 1981-82 and 1979-80, both in 1983-84 real prices, are £865 and £790. Real terms are the cash terms for each year adjusted by the gross domestic product deflator at market prices with 1983-84=100.

Teacher Training

48. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications were received from students for places in teacher training colleges last year; and how many places were available.

Mr. Dunn: The total number of applications received by the Clearing House Registry and the Graduate Teacher Training Registry for entry in September 1984 to courses of initial teacher training in England and Wales was 33,296. This figure excludes applications for entry to undergraduate courses of initial teacher training in universities, which are made through the Universities' Central Council on Admission, and for which figures are not collected separately. The target number of intakes for initial teacher training courses for 1984-85 was 16,735, including 500 intakes to undergraduate courses in universities.

Truancy

49. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to seek to reduce the truancy rate.

Mr. Dunn: As my right hon. Friend said in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 22 March at column 626, a draft circular on school attendance and education welfare services was sent on 21 March to local authority and teacher associations and to other relevant organisations. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library. Comments were sought by 1 July and are now being considered with a view to the circular being issued as soon as possible.

Independent Schools (Public Facilities)

54. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance he has given to local education authorities on the use of public facilities for children attending independent schools.

Mr. Dunn: None as such, but my hon. Friend will be hearing shortly from my right hon. Friend in respect of certain decisions taken by Nottinghamshire county council.

University Places

55. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the supply of and demand for university places during the next academic year.

Mr. Brooke: The provisional estimate of home initial entrants to universities in Great Britain in autumn 1984 is 71,000. The number of entrants is not expected to change significantly in 1985. By March 1985 the Universities Central Council on Admissions received 154,000 applications from home candidates for admission to universities in 1985. Of these very roughly 40 per cent. are likely either not to qualify or otherwise not to maintain their application. Although all qualified applicants are not able to find a place in a university those who are unsuccessful should be able to find a place elsewhere in higher education.

In-service Education and Training

59. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether, following the report of Her Majesty's Inspectorate on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on education provision in England 1984, he will meet local education authorities to discuss future development of in-service education and training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has already had preliminary discussions with representatives of the local authority associations on the Government's plans set out in the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) to introduce a new specific grant for in-service training. It is the Government's intention, through the proposed new grant arrangements, to bring about more effective planning and management of in-service training, including improved procedures for identifying teachers' needs for training and for matching those needs with suitable training activities.

Comprehensive Schools

61. Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the minimum size for comprehensive schools since publication of the White Paper, "Better Schools", Cmnd. 9469.

Mr. Dunn: No representations have been received but, as indicated in "Better Schools", we are arranging to consult the local authority associations, the voluntary bodies and the other partners in the education service on the principles proposed in Cmnd. 9469 about the minimum size of schools of certain types.

Youth Training Scheme

63. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has had on the educational content of the two-year youth training scheme.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien).

Primary and Secondary Education

65. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many primary and secondary places there are now in the maintained education system in England; and what is the full cost of maintaining these places.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1984 there were estimated to be 4·85 million primary places and 4·16 million secondary places maintained in use by local education authorities in England. The cost of maintaining these places in the financial year 1983-84 was £571·8 million in primary schools and £741·4 million in secondary schools.

Overseas Students

67. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many overseas students were in higher education in the United Kingdom in 1979-80 and in 1984-85.

Mr. Brooke: About 58,600 full-time and sandwich students domiciled abroad enrolled on higher education courses in Great Britain in 1979-80. The provisional estimate for 1984-85 is 47,600. Figures for the United Kingdom are not readily available.

Universities (Research Grants)

69. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will conduct a review of the criteria employed by research councils for the allocation of research grants to universities.

Mr. Brooke: No. The research councils are responsible for making scientific judgments within their fields. My right hon. Friend looks to the Advisory Board for the Research Councils for advice on the balance of councils' scientific programmes. I understand that, in forming a view on this, the board explores the basis on which councils reach judgments, particularly the criteria they apply and the general procedures for determining priorities. The board is currently pursuing these matters in the context of discussing councils' corporate plans.

Clinical Academics (Pay)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what reply he is sending to the letter of 18 June from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals expounding its view that it is unable to undertake discussions on clinical academics' pay until it knows the outcome of the earlier approaches that it made to his Department on funding;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter of 18 June to him from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on the subject of clinical academics' pay;

(3) if he will make a statement on Government funding policy as it affects the clinical academic staff salaries Committee's remit to ensure the continuance of comparability between clinical academic staff and their National Health Service counterparts.

Mr. Peter Brooke: Following is the text of the letter of 18 June to my right hon. Friend from the chairman of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals about funding arrangements for the salaries of clinical academic staff. My right hon. Friend will reply to that letter as soon as possible. In the meantime he has no plans to make a statement.

From the Chairman: Maurice Shock, MA

18 June 1985

Dear Keith,

You will be aware of my Committee's continuing and increasing concern during the past three years over the funding arrangements for the payment of the salaries of clinical academic staff in universities in the light of the increases promulgated by the Government for doctors and dentists in the National Health Service. The recent decision to implement the recommendations of the Review Body on Doctors' and Dentists' Remuneration has made the position acute, and I am writing to seek your assistance in resolving the matter.

My Committee was in correspondence with you and your officials last year and this led to a useful exchange with the Permanent Secretaries of both the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health and Social Security. We are still awaiting the Government's response to the representations which we made on that occasion, and are now additionally faced with the most serious implications of the recent announcement by the Government.

Our situation is becoming impossible. The machinery of the Clinical Academic Staff Salaries Committee (CASSC) was established in November 1979, with the agreement of the Government, the University Grants Committee, the universities and the staff associations, to provide for the direct translation to clinical academic staff of any salary settlement approved by the Government for doctors and dentists in the NHS. It was not set up as a negotiating body. In circumstances where the Government has again approved an award for NHS staff which is over 6 per cent while allowing only 3 per cent. for pay increases for staff in universities the CASSC machinery is virtually inoperable.

The situation is quite different from that for non-clinical staff, where we negotiate directly with the Association of University Teachers and have achieved through our machinery settlements nearer the Government's pay norms than has the Government itself.

In the context of the severe and increasing financial restraints on universities there is no realistic possibility of finding the necessary funds for these increases in NHS levels of clinical pay from within our present resources. This is not the occasion for going into the details of a case which we have already made but I would wish to stress that the reintroduction of pay differentials between academic and NHS clinical staff would have the most serious implications for the contribution which university medical education and training, research and patient care make to the NHS.

At the CASSC held last week, we told the staff side that the universities were unable to undertake discussions on the translation of the new NHS salary levels to clinical academic salaries until we knew the outcome of the approaches made to your Department and the DHSS earlier in the year for funding to enable universities to meet their obligations both in this current financial year and in future years.

We await your response as a matter of urgency.

I am copying this letter to the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security.

Sincerely,

Maurice

University Students (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total number of students attending each Scottish university in the academic years 1983-84 and 1984-85; what were the numbers of full-time academic staff at each university in both years; and what were the staff-student ratios in each case in each year.

Mr. Brooke: Statistics for 1984-85 are not yet available. The information for 1983-84 is:

University	Full-time equivalent student load (1)	Full-time departmental academic staff wholly university financed (2)	Staff-students ratios (1):(2)
Aberdeen	5,535	583	9·5
Dundee	3,211	346	9·3
Edinburgh	10,438	1,087	9·6
Glasgow	10,901	1,025	10·6
Heriot-Watt	2,991	271	11·0
St. Andrews	3,532	318	11·1
Stirling	2,606	247	10·6
Strathclyde	7,298	668	10·9

Natural Environment Research Council

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will require the chairman of the Advisory Board for Research Councils to re-examine the corporate plan of the Natural Environment Research Council and the role within it of the British geological survey.

Mr. Brooke: No, but as I indicated on 19 July a separate review of geological surveying will shortly take place.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from hon. Members and others about the role within the Natural Environment Research Council of the British geological survey.

Mr. Brooke: I have received 25 letters from hon. Members and nine from others.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representation his Department has provided on the committee of the Natural Environment Research Council meeting to choose a new director of Earth sciences; and what are the roles of the two assessors on that committee.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the following people have been invited by the Natural Environment Research Council to act as the selection committee for the post of director of Earth sciences. There are no assessors on the committee.

Mr. H. Fish—Chairman, NERC
Dr. J. C. Bowman—Secretary

Lord Cranbrook—NERC Council Member

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has issued any guidance to local education authorities regarding Her Majesty's Government's policy towards compliance by them with the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights on corporal punishment pending a final decision by Parliament on the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill; what representations he has received on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Until there is a change in the law, the legal right to use corporal punishment in schools is not affected by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Campbell and Cosans. As regards the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer earlier today to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

School Meals

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Her Majesty's Government plans to introduce legislation which will affect the discretionary power of local authorities to provide free or reduced cost school meals.

Mr. Dunn: Under the proposals in the Social Security Green Paper pupils with parents on income support (which would succeed supplementary benefit) would continue to be entitled to free school meals, but pupils with parents on family credit (which would succeed family income supplement) would not be entitled to free school meals and the rates of family credit would be enhanced instead.

Local education authorities would still be able to charge whatever price they liked for an item, subject to the same constraints as now, but they would not be empowered as they are now to charge a differentially lower price for the same item to a particular group or category of pupils, nor to remit the whole price, other than to pupils of parents on income support.

Technology in Schools

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for the further development of new technology in schools when the microelectronics education programme ends in March 1986.

Sir Keith Joseph: I propose to set up a new body, to be called the microelectronics support unit, which will provide support to local education authorities in a number of clearly defined areas, namely, the provision of a central information service; the training of trainers; and the development of relevant curricular materials for use in schools. The Government will also support, through the new unit and the existing regional network for special education, the further development of microelectronics in this field. The provision of inservice teacher training and the supply and dissemination of local and regional information will be the responsibility of local education authorities in the course of their normal provision of educational services. These decisions have been taken after consultation with a wide range of bodies.

The Government have allocated £2·2 million in 1986-87 to support the new body. The unit will run for five years with a review after three. This sum will be additional to those allocated by the Department of Trade and Industry for educational software as announced today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The microelectronics support unit will support work in England, Wales and Northern Ireland and will be centrally located. It will be under the control of a management board which a representative of the local education authorities will be invited to chair. Representatives of the Secondary Examinations Council, the Schools Curriculum Development Committee, the Council for Educational Technology, higher education, the IT industry and employers will be asked to make up the remainder of the board, together with HMI and departmental officials. Other details relating to the responsibilities and operation of the unit and its management board will be decided in consultation with local education authorities and others.

The new unit will follow and build upon the work of the microelectronics education programme which has made a significant contribution to the use of computers and microelectronic devices in schools in recent years.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Committees of Inquiry

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Commonwealth Secretaries, Colonial Secretaries and Ministers of Overseas Development have commissioned since 1955; and what are the subjects, the date of commissioning, the name of the chairman, the dates they commenced and the dates of publication.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to appendices B and C of "Royal Commissions and Departmental Committees in Britain — a Case-Study in Institutional Adaptiveness and Public Participation in Government" by T. J. Cartwright, a copy of which is held by the House Library. These appendices list major post-war Royal Commissions and Departmental committees between 1945 and 1974, the reports of which were published as command papers. I regret that a separate listing for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to include any such committees the reports of which were not published as command papers and to extend the list beyond 1974, could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Terrorism

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of recent East-West co-operation on terrorism, he will ask the Soviet Union to show a commitment to the elimination of groups such as the Red Army Faction and the Action Directe.

Mr. Renton: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in her answer to my hon. Friend on 22 July, we believe the Soviet Union has a role to play in combatting international terrorism. We will take every suitable opportunity to urge them to join with others in the common fight against terrorism.

Falklands War

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his statement of 14 March, Official Report, column 497, whether any documents have subsequently come to light which were relevant to the deliberations of the committee chaired by Lord Franks into the events surrounding the Falklands war which were not available to that committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: None.

Guatemala

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Guatemala concerning the resumptions of consular relations; what conditions the United Kingdom Government have made before consular relations can be resumed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Stretford on 13 November 1984. Talks have been held at official level but nothing has been decided. It is not normal international practice to impose preconditions on the establishment of consular relations.

Uganda

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any recent reports from the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Uganda about the Ugandan Government's investigation of allegations of human rights violations in that country; if he intends to ask for further reports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We receive regular reports from the British High Commission in Kampala about the human rights situation in Uganda and about the action being taken by the Ugandan Government in this regard.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps he proposes to take to monitor the implementation by the Ugandan Government of an impartial investigation into the allegations of human rights violations in Uganda; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We have urged the Ugandan government to implement the recommendations of the recent report by Amnesty International; and we understand that arrangements for a visit to Uganda by an Amnesty delegation are being discussed with the Ugandan authorities. We look forward to hearing the outcome of the visit.

Diplomatic Missions (London)

Mr. Howard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will publish in the Official Report the guidance he has recently issued to members of diplomatic missions in London on how they should behave.

Mr. Renton: In April this year my department prepared a memorandum for all new diplomats in London drawing attention to various matters of public concern and giving guidance about their behaviour. It is now being issued to all members of diplomatic missions on arrival. In addition, the Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs circulated it to all heads of diplomatic missions on 22 April asking them to ensure that it was seen by all members of their staff and their dependents who were entitled to diplomatic immunity. The text of the memorandum is as follows:

"MEMORANDUM FOR ALL NEW DIPLOMATS IN LONDON DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY.

This memorandum is intended to be of assistance to all persons entitled to diplomatic privileges and immunities and particularly to those newly appointed to London. It draws attention to a number of matters of public concern.

It would be helpful if you could make sure that members of your family who are with you in London are aware of its contents, since they also apply to all those in a position to claim immunity. Your co-operation and that of your family in maintaining the high standards of conduct expected of the Diplomatic Corps, and in ensuring friendly relations between the corps and the residents of London, will be greatly appreciated.

Diplomats and their families are expected to respect the laws and regulations of the United Kingdom, in accordance with article 41 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. Diplomatic immunity in no way absolves diplomats from their duty to obey the law. All allegations of breach of the law which come to the attention of the police are thoroughly investigated and the results reported to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office draw these to the attention of the Head of Mission (or sometimes a senior official) in the expectation of disciplinary action.

In serious cases additional action will be taken. Where a waiver of immunity is not granted to permit trial in this country, violent crime, incitement to or advocacy of violence, espionage and drug trafficking will, as a general rule, result in the offender being declared persona non grata. In addition the following categories of offence normally lead to a request for the transfer from post of the offender in the absence of a waiver:

(a) Firearms offences: A firearm or shotgun certificate from the police is required for all firearms, whether acquired in the United Kingdom or imported. In no circumstances will certificates be granted for firearms or shotguns use for personal protection. Any breach of firearms regulations will result in a request for withdrawal of the offender. This is almost always an automatic consequence of an offence of this kind. It should be noted that the possession of other types of weapon, including gas canisters, is also illegal in this country;

(b) Drink-driving offences: Driving while under the influence of alcohol (or drugs) is a very serious offence. Even a first offence of this kind could lead to a request for withdrawal, particularly if aggravated by violence or injury to a third party. For a second offence this would be automatic;

(c) Other serious traffic offences: These include incidents involving death or serious injury or driving without third party insurance. Drivers must not only hold a valid driving licence but also be covered by third party insurance. A failure by a diplomat to hold third party insurance for himself or any member of his family who drives a car is likely to lead to a request for his transfer from the United Kingdom. Cars must be kept in roadworthy condition; if they are more than three years old, they have to have an annual MOT test of their roadworthiness. Drivers are required to stop if they are involved in an accident and to report the accident to the police within 24 hours, unless no personal injury was caused and they provide details of driving licence and insurance to the other driver at the scene of the accident. Exceeding the speed limit can also be regarded as a serious offence;

(d) Theft including shoplifting: Customers found outside shop premises with goods which they have taken and intentionally not paid for are normally prosecuted for theft. If a diplomat or a member of his family should be found in this position with no satisfactory explanation, the police will be called and the facts reported to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. This type of offence may lead to a request for the transfer of the diplomat from the United Kingdom and will certainly do so if repeated;

(e) Other serious breaches of criminal law: These include fraud and serious sexual offences as well as any other offence normally carrying a prison sentence of more than 12 months;

(f) Civil claims: A serious view is taken of any reliance on diplomatic immunity from civil jurisdiction to evade a legal obligation. Such conduct could call into question a diplomat's continued acceptability in the United Kingdom.

The criteria for dealing with alleged offences are applied with both firmness and discretion, but not automatically. Full account is taken of the nature and seriousness of the offence and any inadequacies in the evidence.

Parking: Diplomats are required to comply with local parking regulations and to pay any charges for parking meters and residents' parking spaces. Illegal parking is a matter of considerable public concern in London. It can cause traffic congestion as well as great inconvenience to local residents and traders. The very large number of cases involving cars with diplomatic number plates brings the Diplomatic Corps into disrepute. Cars are liable to be towed away if they cause obstruction or danger. Detailed records are kept of unpaid parking tickets by both individual diplomats and official cars. Persistent failure by individual diplomats to respect parking regulations and pay fixed penalty notices will call into question their continued acceptability as members of diplomatic missions in London.

Finally, diplomats are expected to show consideration towards their neighbours. Inconsiderate behaviour, such as the holding of noisy parties late at night, can bring the name of the mission of the sending state and of the Diplomatic Corps as a whole into disrepute. It can in some cases also constitute a breach of the law.

Whatever action the British Government may decide to take following an incident involving a diplomat or a member of his family will of course depend on a most careful consideration of the nature of that incident. The purpose of this memorandum is to explain informally the possible consequences of breaches of British law. It cannot be taken as determining any particular course of action in any particular case.

More detailed guidance and information on many of these subjects has been communicated in separate notices to diplomatic missions. Protocol Department will be glad to provide further information or answer specific queries.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Free Prescriptions and Treatment

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which people, by reason of their occupation, are entitled to free prescriptions, dental or optical treatment or reimbursement of such charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A person's occupation has no bearing on his or her entitlement to exemption or remission from National Health Service charges. If any employer reimburses the charges to its employees, that is entirely the responsibility of that employer.

Nuclear Radiation

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the typical latent periods before diagnosis of different types of cancer and leukaemia following exposure to nuclear radiation above background levels; and if he will make a statement on the consequences for reliable epidemiological studies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Latent periods are considered to vary depending on the dose received, the age at which it is received and the organ or tissue exposed or irradiated with a mean of between 12 and 25 years. The subject is considered at greater length in the National Radiological Protection Board's report NRPB-R171—"The Risks of Leukaemia and other Cancers in Seascale from Radiation Exposure".

Such variations are taken into account when epidemiological studies are undertaken, and mean that the period of follow-up necessary before firm conclusions can be drawn on possible effects will vary according to the cancer-type under consideration.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reliable epidemiological data are available to him on the incidence of health effects, including cancers, caused by exposure to small amounts of nuclear radiation; and if he will publish a list of the relevant studies, stating in each case (a) the period of time covered by the data and (b) whether dose rates of radiation exposure were accurately known.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This is an extremely complex subject. The United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation report regularly on this topic to the General Assembly. Their 1977 and 1982 reports* and annexes include data and references on small doses of radiation from pre-natal, occupational and nuclear fall-out exposures.

* Sources and Effects of Ionising Radiation — 1977 UNSCEAR report; Ionising Radiation: Sources and Biological Effects—1982 UNSCEAR report.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what epidemiological studies have been undertaken to investigate the relative incidence of cancers in areas of the United Kingdom with differing levels of background nuclear radiation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not aware of any such studies. There is, however, a study under way at present which will compare the geographical variations of medical and non-medical radiation exposures within the United Kingdom and the rates of cancer in children.

Appeals Tribunals

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are made by the president of the social security appeal tribunals to provide appellants at those tribunals with addresses of local agencies offering advice and representation at the appeal hearing.

Mr. Whitney: The content of standard forms issued by the office of the president of social security appeal tribunals is a matter for the president to determine. However, I understand that form AT38, which acknowledges receipt of an appeal and form AT6, which notifies an appellant of the date of a tribunal hearing, include the following paragraph:

"WOULD YOU LIKE HELP WITH THIS APPEAL?

WOULD YOU LIKE SOMEONE TO SPEAK FOR YOU AT THE TRIBUNAL?

If so contract your local Citizens' Advice Bureau, independent advice centre, or Law Centre. They can give you free advice and sometimes they will go along with you to the tribunal. You can get their addresses from the phone book, or the Library, or from your local council."

Departmental forms and those used by the Department of Employment for unemployment benefit are being revised to include similar information.

Low-wage Households

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provisions will be made in the proposed reform of social security for low-wage households expecting their first baby who will lose their current entitlement to maternity grant, free milk and vitamins; and whether any special arrangements are proposed to help ensure a health pregnancy and to meet the costs of a new baby.

Mr. Newton: Special arrangements will be considered under the social fund for the maternity expenses of low income families expecting their first child.

Income Support Scheme

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Government's proposals to abolish the distinction between householders and non-householders in the proposed income support scheme includes the abolition of the addition paid for housing costs to non-householders.

Mr. Newton: Yes. The rate of personal allowance in the income support scheme would be determined by the claimant's age and marital status rather than by his housing circumstances.

Family Credit

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has consulted any employers' organisations, especially those representing small businesses about the implications for employers of paying family credit through the pay packet.

Mr. Newton: When the Green Paper was published, we wrote to the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses to let them know about the proposals in which employers had a major interest, and that there would be detailed discussions with them about those proposals. Arrangements for these discussions are in hand.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the numbers paying class 1 and class 2 national insurance contributions and the proportion contracted out of the state pension scheme.

Mr. Whitney: In the 1982-83 tax year the numbers of people who paid class 1 and class 2 national insurance contributions are estimated to be 22,006,400 and 1,296,900 respectively. These figures are based on a 1 per cent sample. The proportion of class 1 contributors contracted-out of the state earnings-related pension scheme is about 46 per cent.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report the number of males and females paying national insurance on a full-time and on a part-time basis at the present time compared with 1979 and 1973; and if he will provide similar figures for manufacturing.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of males and females paying class 1 employed earners contributions for the years in question are:

	Year ending
	April 1973	April 1979	April 1983
Males	14,219,000	14,730,000	13,236,900
Females	3,980,000	9,412,450	8,770,100

Notes:

(1) The figures are derived from a 1 per cent. sample.
(2) 1983 figures are the latest available.
(3) The figures also include the numbers of contributors paying a mixture of Class 1 and Class 2 (self-employed) contributions.
(4) Separate figures are not available for manufacturing.
(5) The figures cannot be broken down into full-time and part-time contributors.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of married women and widows paying the reduced rate contribution.

Mr. Whitney: The latest estimates of the numbers of married women and widows paying the reduced-rate contribution are:

	Number
Married women	*2,236,900
Widows	†24,200
Total	2,261,100

*Includes 54,000 paying a mixture of standard and reduced-rate contributions.

†Includes 100 paying a mixture of standard and reduced-rate contributions.

These figures are based on a 1 per cent. sample of contributions paid in the year ending 5 April 1983.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce his detailed requirements of employers for such information on national insurance contributions in so far as such requirements are altered by the provisions of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Whitney: The Social Security Act provides for employers to be compensated for their share of national insurance contributions payable on statutory sick pay.

Employers will deduct the appropriate compensation from their monthly payments of national insurance contributions to the Collector of Taxes and will be required to show on their end-of-year returns the total of amounts so deducted. Details of the new procedure will be sent next month to employers with the tables of the national insurance contributions applicable from 6 October. No other provisions in the Act give rise to changes in the information required from employers about national insurance contributions.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to obtain the views of manufacturers and suppliers of payroll packages on the effects of the provisions of the Social Security Bill in relation to multiple-rate national insurance contributions, and the consequent changed requirements for year-end information.

Mr. Whitney: The changes in national insurance contributions were discussed by our officials with the British Computer Society on 28 March and subsequent discussions have been held with various individual companies. The only change in end-of-year information is a requirement for employers to state the total amount of compensation for contributions on statutory sick pay which they have deducted from payments to the Collector of Taxes.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost for 1985-86 of the £10 Christmas bonus for pensioners; and if he will publish a table of the additional cost of increasing the bonus by (a) 25 per cent., (b) 50 per cent., (c) 75 per cent. and (d) 100 per cent.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

1985-86 estimated benefit cost—£111 million

Estimated costs of	£ million
25 per cent. increase	27·75
50 per cent. increase	55·50
75 per cent. increase	83·25
100 per cent. increase	111·00

Sick Pay

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether receipt of statutory sick pay will count towards the 28-week qualifying period for the premium payable to sick and disabled people proposed in the Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security".

Mr. Newton: Yes.

Child Allowances

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a table showing the combined value of child tax allowance after clawback and family allowance or child benefit for each year since 1955 expressed at 1985 prices, using the annual rate of inflation to May for the years 1985 and 1984, for the first, second, third and each subsequent child aged under 11 years, 11 to 16 years and over 16 years, in standard rate taxpaying families.

Mr. Whitney: Comparison of values at dates other than upratings can be misleading and unhelpful. The figures up to the last uprating date of November 1984 are given in the table. They will be updated when the movement in the retail price index over the 12 months to November 1985 is known.

Social Security Review

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether under 18-year-olds who are pregnant will be entitled to free milk and vitamins during pregnancy if the proposals in the Green Paper on the reform of social security are implemented.

Mr. Newton: Entitlement would continue for those whose families are entitled to income support.

Severely Handicapped Children (Care)

Mr. Thornham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total annual cost of caring for a severely handicapped child (a) in a specialist institution and (b) in foster care (i) in England and Wales and (ii) in the London area; and what are the total numbers of children involved in each category.

Mr. John Patten: I regret that information is not available in the form requested. Information about services for children and handicapped people in different local authority areas, and their costs, is to be found in the Personal Social Services Statistics compiled by the Chartered Institution of Public Finance and Accountancy, copies of which are in the Library.

NHS (Dispensing Contracts)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in introducing the arrangements to regulate entry to National Health Service dispensing contracts, as agreed between the Government and the profession.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am glad to say that we are making very good progress. The new arrangements we intend to introduce will safeguard and improve the NHS pharmaceutical service while ensuring NHS funds are used to best effect. We are now consulting the representatives of the pharmaceutical profession on the content of the regulations and guidance which will be needed to implement our agreement. Family Practitioner Committees (FPCs) will decide on applications for both new openings and moves of existing pharmacies solely by reference to the NHS needs of local people. The governing principle will be to ensure each local population has reasonable access to the full range of NHS pharmaceutical services but that no locality has an expensive and unnecessary surplus of dispensaries. We have no Government target for NHS pharmacy numbers, nationally or locally. The needs of the public and patients will determine the number of new pharmacies gaining NHS contracts.
